Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Part I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Lord Salisbury's explanation of the epithet "black man" used by him with reference to Mr. Dádábhái Navroji.

1. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 30th December, writes:—Mr. Gladstone's stout and manly words in favour of the "black men" of India have at last opened the eyes of the English Premier to the full height of the indiscretion committed by him in his Edinburgh speech. The consequence is that Lord Salisbury has thought it fit to make an apology, although a very lame one. What an instructive sight it is to see the Prime Minister of England going down on his knees, as it were, and confessing that he used words which he should not have done! Of course, Lord Salisbury is a proud nobleman and cannot bend his knees gracefully He makes a bungle of it. Instead of making a straightforward apology he trie to "explain." He says now that he only meant to say that none but Englis men could be the real representatives of an English constituency, and that "black man" he wanted to indicate a foreign race. If so, could he not h expressed his meaning in a less offensive manner?

2. Referring to the same subject, the Arunodayă (21), in its issue of the 30th December, says:—The minds of the natives of India will rather be excited than pacified by Lord Salisbury's explanation. The last sentence in it shows that even an English Premier is sometimes an image of meanness a selfishness. If it be unwise to elect a native of India to represent a British c stituency, it is also unwise, according to Lord Salisbury's reasoning, that o European should have control over about a thousand natives of India, and it fo lows that the Natives can without any objection drive the Europeans out of th country. If the Parliament is peculiarly a British machine which can be work by British hands alone, would it be wrong if a Native were to say that a administration which is conducted by the natives of India would suit the best and that a foreign rule puts their machine of happiness out of order. Anybod will admit that India is at present under the frowns of fortune and we s that God alone is able to relieve it. Are the promises given in the Proclam tion of 1858 to be interpreted in the light of Lord Salisbury's speech? To that the natives of India are unfit to sit in Parliament is tantamount saying that the people of India, being a conquered people, must rem satisfied with the little bit of bread that may be thrown to them by their c querors. If this be the case, the Proclamation of 1858 should be cancelled and Lord Salisbury should issue a new one in its place. We shall then shape our course accordingly. This double-dealing is beneficial neither to Government nor to the subject-people. It is better to kill a person at once than to torture him slowly. If even after 50 years' connection with the British people we are not fit to be members of Parliament, it is better that there should be no connection with them in future. It is also shameful to the British that we should be so unfit. If Lord Salisbury is really sorry for the use of the epithet "black man" and if he wants to act in a manner befitting his position of Premier, he should place his explanation before the public in a much modified form. The apology now tendered is more foolish than the original mistake, and is an evidence of the indifference of the English Premier to India.

3. The Anonymous (97), in its issue of the 30th December, observes:- explanation given by Lord Salisbury is not satisfactory. It was expecte His Lordship would withdraw the opprobrious words, but he has confirmed was said by him before. Thus a public affront has been given to India th Mr. Dádábhái Navroji. The Conservative party is reputed to be ever ne of the interests of India. [The Hindusthán (115), the Gujarát Mitră (87) Pársi Punch (129) of the 30th December, the Broach Mitră (101) of January and the Gujarát Gazette (85) of the 3rd January expre sentiments.]

Dhulip Sing's ravings should not be altogether overlooked.

4. The Anonymous (97), in its issue of the 30th December, says:—Dhu is annoyed at the extremely unjust treatment by him at the hands of the British Governm he has taken refuge under the Russian Gover The account given by the háráia of h he Standard, the Truth and other English newspapers is not false. It is no wonder that the Mahárája should have lost his senses as he has been deprived of his kingdom and is otherwise unjustly treated. The British Government does not seem to care for the ravings of the Mahárája, but this is not good. It is very shameful on the part of the Mahárája to go over to Russia, the implacable enemy of India, but he seems to have been driven to despair. However, the British Government should not be altogether heedless of his ravings.

The Lushai expedition.

5. In alluding to the small expedition that is to be despatched to punish the Lushais, the Hindusthán (115), in its issue of the 30th December, says:—It is to be much regretted that His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's administration of India should begin with military expedition. It is not, however, His Lordship's fault that it should be), because being quite new to the situation of the country His Lordship has had submit to the advice of his Councillors. The warlike policy adopted by Lord fferin in regard to the borders of the country has considerably impoverished treasury and led to neglect of measures necessary for the material prosperity of the country. The present is not the proper time for undertaking a small border war, that might continue long to the great inconvenience of the country. But since the step has been taken, it is to be hoped that after effectually mishing the refractory and troublesome neighbours the expedition will return once, and that the Viceroy will adopt in future a peaceful policy with the neighuring tribes and will devote his attention to the advancement of the material id moral prosperity of the country. [The Satyodayă (137) of the 27th ecember and the Gujarát Gazette (85) and the Broach Samáchár (102) of the d January express similar sentiments.]

Approval of His Excellency rd Lansdowne's replies to Calcutta addresses.

6. The Indu Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 31st December, says:—His Excellency Lord Lansdowne has had addresses presented to him by three bodies at Calcutta—the Mahomedan Literary Society, the Indian Association, and the Health Society. The replies to these addresses, igh they do not contain any declaration of future policy, are highly interest- as the first words of the Viceroy. It is indeed too early yet to expect His Exlency to make any declaration of policy, but it is pleasing to note that the words of His Lordship are sufficiently reassuring. They bespeak a frankness and liberality which, if we are not too sanguine, foreshadow a reign of progressive domestic reform and a return of the times of India's greatest Viceroy, Lord Ripon. In his reply to the Literary Society, Lord Lansdowne said:—"I can assure you that nothing would be more agreeable to me than to be able to devote my attention, without disturbance, to the domestic requirements of the country and to the careful administration of its finances, which, owing to the circumstances which you have mentioned, undoubtedly require the most vigilant treatment at the present time." These words may indeed be meant to be no more than a formal greeting appropriate to the occasion. But from all we have heard of His Lordship's opinions, as far as they could be ascer- l in conversations, we are encouraged to hope that the promise here yed is the expression of a sincere and deliberate resolution formed for guidance. In the reply to the address of the Indian Association another nce equally valuable is conveyed, showing a liberal temper and openness eive assistance from the people.

The same newspaper says:—As parents or guardians are responsible if children turn out bad, so kings or rulers are to a great degree responsible for the bad conduct of their subjects, as will be borne out by the history of lisasters like the French Revolution. At present some Government hink that the Indian newspapers write very severely about Gov- and that something should be done to check them. We need not r opinion on this point. Sir Richard Garth has dealt with it in an it manner. Whatever our people say or write, they say or write under on. They are uite helpless in the matter. If they make unpalatable he fault li the door of Government. If the demands of people made through newspapers or public associations had been granted, or if the promises made by Her Majesty the Queen in the Proclamation of 1858 had been fulfilled by Government, there would have been no necessity for the Indian National Congress and its laborious exertions. In fact, all our political movements are to be attributed to the doings of Government. We have therefore respectfully to say to Government that if they wish that we should be perfectly loyal, they should treat us accordingly. So long as you treat us as a crafty and disloyal people, it is difficult for us to be frank and loyal. In speaking well of the National Congress, Mr. Gladstone does not only correctly describe it, but encourages it to become better. Confidence is a wonderful thing. Ask those people who have founded the British rule in India and they will say that of all things confidence has served them most. If Clive had reposed no confidence in the Native sepoys, he could not have conquered the Carnatic or gained a victory at the battle of Plassey. So if the present officers do not similarly trust us they will not succeed well in their administration. To test the truth of this assertion it is only sufficient to imagine the confusion which will take place if the Europeans act upon the supposition that all the Native officers are faithless. We, at any rate, are of opinion that the present great glory of the British Indian Empire is due to the implicit faith which some high-minded officers have in Natives. In proof of this it may be said that a considerable portion of the power of administration is reposed in our hands, and the greater the increase in this power the stronger will be the foundations of the British rule.

Charge of bribing Anglo-Indian newspapers brought against the Government of India and comments thereon.

8. The Pratod (57), in its issue of the 31st December, says:—An influential newspaper published at Calcutta charges the Government of India with having secretly paid money from Government Treasury to several Anglo-Indian newspapers for writing against the Indian National Congress. How far this allegation is true is not known; but if it be well founded, we do not know what to say of this mean act of Government. Instead of taking this circuitous course, is it not better to suppress the National Congress altogether? Why should the Government make such a bugbear of a National Congress of the conquered Hindus? Who will question the Government if by one stroke they stop the whole agitation? The time is distant when people will be called to book for their just and unjust deeds and when they will be dealt with according to their merit. Till then Government officers should spare no pains to bring about the discomfiture of the poor Natives, and if they fail in this we shall say that they are not genuine Europeans.

Congratulations to the friends and opponents of the Indian National Congress on its successful meeting at Allahabad.

9. The Gujaráti (86), in its issue of the 30th December, gives a short résume of the proceedings of the Congress meetings for the first three days, and says:—We think that this year's Congress has proved a more splendid success than any of its predecessors, and we heartily congratulate the promoters of this historical movement upon the remarkable success that has attended their patriotic efforts, and also the glorious body of anti-Congressionists, including Lord Dufferin, Sir A. Colvin, Sir Syed Ahmed and Co., the Pioneer, the Times of India and its blind followers in the Native press, upon the keen disappointment which will be felt by them owing to the ever-growing importance of the national movement which has favourably impressed the greatest living statesman of England and which is surely destined to attract the attention of all champions of human progress in England and on the Continent.

10. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 30th December, says:—On the whole, we have good reason to congratulate ourselves upon the unqualified success of this year's Congress meeting, which leads us to hope that this practical proof of the truth of Mr. Gladstone's statement that the Indian people are awakening to a new political life, will convince all reasonable people, Natives as well as Europeans, of the importance and real significance of the Congress movement, and that as a natural consequence our just aspirations will be realised at no distant date.

11. The Gujarát Darpan (84), in its issue of the 3rd January, writes:—It is a matter for no small congratulation to us all that the tone of the Congress was very moderate and loyal throughout. If reports of the proceedings of the Allahabad meeting published in the Bombay dailies are to be relied upon, we can very gladly say that the movement is made for no other purpose than to strengthen the British Empire, to prove a well-meaning auxiliary to it, and, last but not least, to ask of our benign rulers redress of grievances which are at present badly oppressing us. One notable feature of the last Congress is that many educated and enlightened Anglo-Indians have with characteristic earnestness joined it. Those of our English officials and self-assertive Anglo-Indians who see in the Congress "real ruin and the breaking of laws" will, we hope, be calmed down to a great extent, if they carefully read between the lines the published reports and view the things in their true light. While wishing God-speed and long life to the movement, we suggest that the Congress should conduct itself with the utmost moderation and reasonableness possible.

Proceedings of the meeting of the Indian National Congress at Allahabad.

12. In noticing the proceedings of the Indian National Congress at its recent meeting at Allahabad, the Bombay Samáchár (100), in its issues of the 31st December and 1st January, says:—The resolutions passed by the Congress are appropriate and just, and it is highly desirable that they should be given effect to by Government. The expectations of the Congress are moderate and likely to cause no inconvenience to Government, and belie the assertion made by its opponents that it is blindly led by a few of its leading members. It is quite wrong to bring against such an assembly the charges of disloyalty, selfishness and mischievousness. This year's gathering of the Congress was a more decided success than that of the last year. The number of representatives at the Madras gathering last year was six hundred, while this year they numbered fourteen hundred, containing nearly three hundred educated, influential and leading Mahomedans in spite of the monstrous efforts made by the opponents of the Congress to estrange this community from the movement. The Mahomedan delegates took a leading part in the proceedings of the meetings and expressed disapproval of the conduct of their misguided co-religionists who held themselves aloof from the Congress and opposed it. The attempt made to alienate the Pársis from the Congress proved also a sad failure. Rája Shivaprasád made an effort to knock the Congress on the head, but had to beat an ignominious retreat that will haunt his memory for many years. Numerous messages expressing strong sympathy with the work of the Congress were received from all quarters. This unexpected success is in a measure due to the intelligent and wise exertions of Mr. A. O. Hume, the indefatigable chief Secretary of the Congress, who deserves congratulations for the same, and it is very gratifying that the Congress has duly acknowledged his valuable services by re-appointing him to the office for the next year and by discrediting the efforts made by the opponents of the Congress to malign him. By appointing Mr. Yule as President of the assembly who has discharged his duties most creditably, the Congress has shown that in matters affecting the interests of the country all the races to be found in India are on an equality. [The Jáme Jamshed (116), in its issues of the same dates, expresses similar sentiments, remarking, however, that the Arms' Act need not be amended to the extent desired by the Congress, but that licenses to possess weapons should be made more easily procurable than at present, and that there is no chance whatever of a permission to Indian inhabitants of the country to join the volunteer corps under the existing laws on the subject proving beneficial to the people.]

Gujarát Standing Congress Committee congratulated upon its success in awakening public interest in the Congress movement in Gujarát.

13. The Gujaráti (86), in its issue of the 30th December, heartily congratulates the energetic Secretary of the Gujarát Standing Congress Committee upon the success the latter has achieved in awakening public interest in the whole of Gujarát in the Congress movement, and says:—Much credit is also due to the local press and Mr. Chunilál Lallubhái Párekh for the loyal and hearty services rendered by them—the former by the publication and circulation of leaflets and the latter by his lectures—to the cause of the Indian National Congress. It is certainly a significant sign of the times that in Gujarát alone the number of public lectures delivered numbered close upon one hundred. We were agreeably surprised to read that even the blind poet-laureate of Gujarát, Kavi Dalpatrám Dáyábhái, C.I.E., recently tried to excite the interest of the public of Surat by his lectures and poems on the Congress. The efforts that are now being made in the Madras Presidency to popularize the Congress literature and to acquaint the people with the aims and objects of the movement are very creditable to the Madras Presidency. We are sorry Bombay has done almost nothing to help on the progress of the Congress movement. But whatever our shortcomings, we cannot help saying with the Indian Mirror that "the Congress is an established fact; you can no more eradicate it now from the empire than you could extirpate the multiplication table; for good or for evil there it is, as all-pervading as life, as inevitable as death."

14. The Rást Goftár (91), in its issue of the 30th December, writes:—Now it is an undoubted fact that the Congress has unconsciously been the cause of a deal of disloyal trash in Hindu prints in the mofussil ever since the agitation of this great movement has been allowed to dwindle into the hands of do-nothing school-boys, who, in the absence of anything better, betake themselves to vernacular journalism in their respective towns and villages. Some of them have devoted themselves as it were specially to the cause of the Congress, and, besides writing newspaper articles in their trashy prints, they write essays and deliver lectures and compose poems and songs in the advocacy and praise of the Congress. As an instance in point, we may mention a collection of Gujaráti songs composed for the special occasion of a Congress meeting in Gujarát and issued as a special supplement to an Ahmedabad weekly, the editor of which has valued it so highly as to think it worth his while to present it gratis to all his readers. Now it was not without an effort that we have gone through this collection of songs and verses, and it was not without much indignation and disgust that we rose from a perusal of what we cannot help stigmatising as seditious rubbish. The drift of every song is nearly the same, and it goes no further than to show that India is literally groaning under the injustice and oppression of British misrule and that the National Congress is her only salvation and only hope from all the miseries wrought on her by the English officials and even by the English nation. The poet in his overzeal has not been quite successful in concealing the secret thought lurking in his mind that it is the Congress that will fight for their rights and enable the Hindus to regain their lost power and sway over their country. Though not said in so many words, this is the strain in which the poet sings in his songs, a tagrag and bobtail composer of the modern school-boy type. Now, it cannot be denied that the unfortunate composition of a particular dialogue distributed far and wide in the country, which was first exposed by Sir Auckland Colvin and the authorship of which was ascribed to Mr. Hume, deservedly styled the "Father of the Congress," served as an example to this sort of objectionable Congress literature. But we also blame Government for not taking timely notice of that disloyal and rubbish "Hind and Britannia" which was the first of such seditious nonsense in the revolutionary line and which we were the first to expose. We are sorry to find that the Congress now assembled at Allahabad has hissed out the memorial got up by the Patriotic Association against seditious publications of the mofussil, but barring the anti-Congressionist motives that may underlie this document, we must admit that the memorial contains a great deal of truth as to the disloyal tone of the Hindu vernacular press.

Ahmedabad delegates to the Indian National Congress.

15. A correspondent of the Rást Goftár (91), in its issue of the 30th December, says:—Out of the thirty delegates for the Indian National Congress selected at Ahmedabad some time ago, only four have gone to the Congress. Of these one is a lad of 22 years who recently passed the P. E Examination of the Bombay University, and another delegate is Mr. Kálidás Sánkalchand, the editor of the Rájyabhakt and Ahmedabad Times newspapers, who was recently censured by Government and does not understand English at all.

New Year's honours.

16. In noticing the New Year's day honours, the Bombay Samáchár (100), in its issue of the 3rd January says:—These honours have, as usual, been bestowed on Government servants in greater proportions than upon private men who have done valuable services to the public. Dr. Rámkrishna Gopál Bhándárkar has received the honour of C. I. E. He is a learned and deserving gentleman who should have been long ago favoured with the honour he now gets, but his recent lecture on Indian morality is considered by many persons as an unjustifiable attack upon Hindu morality, made rather to please Europeans than as an exposition of truth. The bestowal of the title of "Shums-ul-Ulma" on Dastur Peshotanji Beharámji Sanjána is not likely to be largely approved of by the Pársi community, who expect that their religious guides should care more for the esteem of the community and for public honours as savants than for empty titles like "Shums-ul-Ulma." [The Jáme Jamshed (116) of the same date expresses similar sentiments.]

Disapproval of the appointment of Mr. B. A. Gupte as Curator, Government Cental Book Depôt, Bombay.

17. The Din Bandhu (8), in its issue of the 30th December, writes:—We believed that this easy-going appointment of the Curator, Government Central Book Depôt, Bombay, carrying a salary of Rs. 350 a month, was to be abolished on the retirement of the present incumbent, Ráo Sáheb N. V. Bápat. We now hear that Mr. B. A. Gupte is to succeed this veteran officer. The selection is made, we learn, on the ground of Mr. Gupte's services in connection with the Indian branch of the London Exhibition. We have nothing to urge against this gentleman's fitness for the post in question, but we had hopes that well-paid appointments of this nature would be reserved for Government servants of long and approved service who looked forward to well deserved advancement in the latter part of their career with little of active and arduous work. Many a department of Government can, if consulted, name such deserving men who have languished for years for want of suitable openings to advancement. The Educational Department itself, for which we believe this post has hitherto been specially reserved, can put forward many an able and deserving claimant. Mr. Gupte is a young man who has not to our knowledge done long service to be entitled to this appointment in supersession of his seniors. His services as an organizer of exhibitions may be great, but, we submit, they must be few and far between, and have from time to time been sufficiently rewarded. It is not for such spasmodic exertions that these important and permanent posts with high emoluments should be held up as prizes. We have no desire to be harsh on a particular individual, nor have we any one in particular to recommend; but we deem it our duty in the interests of a large class of useful servants of Government to point out what we consider would be a hardship and injustice if superior claims to promotion, based on seniority and merit, were overlooked.

18. The Indu Prakásh (13) of the 31st December is at a loss to understand for what special qualification Mr. Chatfield has appointed Mr. Bálkrishna Atmárám Gupte, clerk in the Arts School, Bombay, to be Curator, Government Central Book Depôt, in supersession of learned, old and experienced men like Mr. Vithal Náráyan Páthak and Ráo Sáhebs Vishnu Bálkrishna Sohoni and Gopálráo Nene, and asks where education should be respected if not in the Educational Department. [The Vártáhar (20) of the 30th December also disapproves of Mr. Gupte's appointment.]

The decision of the Honourable Mr. Justice Scott in a Pársi child-marriage case.

19. The Yajdán Parast (148), in its issue of the 30th December, observes:—The decision of Mr. Justice Scott in the suit brought by Mr. Peshotan Hormajdyár Dastur against his wife for repudiation of marriage is in accordance with law and custom, and has therefore met with complete approval from the Pársi community. The custom of child-marriage prevails among these people, but on account of their advance in education and general intelligence it is falling into oblivion. Now-a-days in scarcely five per cent. of the Pársi marriages children under twelve years are married, and it is gratifying that even this small proportion is lessening gradually. It is to be hoped that the good sense of Pársi parents will soon abolish the evil practice totally. [The Suryă Prakásh (93) of the 29th December and the Gujaráti (86) and the Kaiser-i-Hind (119) of the 30th December express similar sentiments.]

Ráo Bahádur Ráste, Honorary Magistrate, Poona.

20. The Dnyán Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 3rd January, writes :—We understand that it is under contemplation to enable Mr. Ráste and Mr. Bhide, Honorary Magistrates, Poona, to sit singly as First Class Magistrates to assist the stipendiary magistracy. We shall not on the present occasion say anything about this or that gentleman being appointed to sit singly; but it seems to us remarkably astonishing that the very gentleman whose notorious incompetence is believed to have been the cause of the change of system, should be thought of as a fit person to sit singly as an Honorary Magistrate of the first class and to dispense justice. If what we have heard be true, the arrangement is likely to give rise to suspicion that there is in some quarters a strong desire to nip the new experiment in the very bud.

The Bench Magistrates at Dhárwár.

21. The Chandrodayă (151), in its issue of the 29th December, says :—It is said that the Government of Bombay have abandoned the scheme of appointing Honorary Magistrates for the city of Bombay on the advice of the High Court. Seeing the way in which the quorum of the Bench Magistrates is held here and the trouble to which people are put, it is better for Government to direct their attention to the Bench Magistrates at Dhárwár.

Purchase of provisions by Government officials travelling in the districts.

22. The Hitechchhu (88) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 3rd January, says :—The failure of the last rains has sent up the prices of provisions, and yet the Government officials moving in the districts are said to be buying them so cheap as to cause a loss to the village dealers. If these purchases are made on the authority of the Nirakh or the settled rates, it is evidently tantamount to robbing the poor dealers.

Administration of the Local Funds.

23. The same newspaper says :—The Collector, his Assistants and Mámlatdárs being presidents and vice-presidents of the district and táluka boards, the portion of the Local Funds set apart for roads and other means of local improvement is not expended with due justice to the farmers from whom the local fund tax is collected. For instance, this year the Daskroi Táluka of the Ahmedabad District realized Rs. 22,000 for the local board, and of this sum Rs. 6,000 have been allotted to the táluka board and the remaining Rs. 16,000 appropriated by the district board. Of the allotment to the táluka board Rs. 500 has been given to the Ranchhodlál Hospital and Rs. 400 to the Leper Hospital—both grants being unjustifiable burdens on the táluka—and only Rs. 5,000 is left to supply the local wants of 137 villages! The district board lays out its funds on the construction of main roads, culverts, &c.,—works useful in themselves, but not so to some of the tálukas that contribute to their construction. The Government Engineering Department executes local fund works, charging 12½ per cent. commission on the cost of the works, and 2½ per cent. commission for examining plans and estimates of táluka works costing Rs. 500 and upwards. The commission charged is so large as to defray the cost of the Engineering Department, Government being able to get its own works done by it without any expenditure. It is therefore to be hoped that the commission will be reduced to 5 and 1 per cent. respectively, and the Collector, his Assistants and Mámlatdárs will not be allowed to serve on local boards as presidents or vice-presidents.

PART II.—Legislation.

The proposal of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce to apply the English Factory Act to India.

24. The Rást Goftár (91), in its issue of the 30th December, writes :—One might have supposed that the ludicrously transparent hypocrisy which is at the bottom of the agitation started by the Manchester Chamber of Commerce hardly needed a reply from the Bombay Mill-owners' Association. No man of ordinary understanding and with a little knowledge of the working of the textile factories in India can be deceived by the loud lamentation of Manchester merchants that the mill industry of India is based upon murder, and that therefore the Government should introduce a Factory Act on the lines of the English legislation on the subject for the protection of the operatives in this country. The selfish motive which inspires the philanthropy of these gentlemen is self-evident. But it would nevertheless have been supine indifference on the part of the Bombay Mill-owners if they had sat quiet, relying upon the inherent strength of their own case. With our knowledge that Manchester succeeded in getting the import duties on cotton goods abolished, it may be feared that the clamour now raised in the name of humanity, palpably insincere as it is, may induce one or other of the political parties in England to yield to it. This fear is undoubtedly based upon a rather low estimate of political virtue, but we know that in the world of politics things are sometimes managed on the principle of "give and take" without much regard to the morality of a bargain, and consequently the counter-movement of the Bombay manufacturers cannot be said to be a pure waste of energy on their part.

The Indian Railways Bill.

25. The Gujaráti (86), in its issue of the 30th December, observes:—It is to be regretted that the grievances of the railway third-class passengers not redressed by the Railway Conference which recently met at Simla should have been ignored by the Railway Amendment Bill now lying before the Viceregal Legislative Council. However, the Honourable Mr. Durgácharan Lál has brought them to the notice of the Select Committee to which the Bill has been submitted. The honourable councillor's action needs support from the public, and it is therefore desirable that the public associations of the country should memorialize the authorities on the subject. [The Suryă Prakásh (93) of the 29th December and the Hindusthán (115), the Gujarát Mitră (87) and the Kaiser-i-Hind (119) of the 30th December express similar sentiments.]

PART III.—Education.

Remarks on the policy of retrenchment in the Educational Department.

26. The Sudhárak (18), in its issue of the 31st December, disapproves of the policy of Government retrenching expenditure on public instruction and says:—Let Government remember that by curtailing educational grants the growth of the productive capacity of the people is curtailed, and with it is also curtailed the possibility of levying additional taxes without exasperation and distress. There is no other feature of the British Government of India that is more entitled to the gratitude and loyalty of the people of this country than the unreserved and liberal manner in which Government has been doing everything in its power to educate and to enlighten all classes of its subjects. And seeing what other civilized Governments are doing for the education of their subjects, the people of India expect their own Government to do the same. Not to do so is to confess comparative backwardness in the attributes that characterize first-class governments. But to do the reverse is to betray signs of decline and future trouble both to the rulers and the ruled. We therefore implore Government not to take such a disastrous step. If it wants money, let it curtail the expenditure of some other department or departments, but leave the educational grant intact.

27. The Dnyán Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 3rd January, says:—It is to be regretted that high and secondary education should receive a blow under the administration of an educationist like His Excellency Lord Reay. The increase in the tuition fee of the Deccan College, Poona, will cause much inconvenience to many poor students and therefore the matter requires to be reconsidered by Government. [Many other papers signify their disapproval of the educational policy of Government and recommend its modification.]

Withdrawal of Government from secondary and high education considered unadvisable.

28. The Gujaráti (86), in its issue of the 30th December, writes:—The observance of religious neutrality, the cultivation of a friendly attitude towards Native States, the establishment of independent courts of justice and educational institutions to which the humblest subject of Her Majesty the Queen-Empress can resort for the redress of his grievances, or for his moral and intellectual elevation, have contributed more than anything else to the consolidation and popularity of British rule in India. All the appliances of material civilization that have been brought into requisition would have been completely thrown away upon the people and remained unutilized or unappreciated but for the corresponding advance made by the people in the moral and intellectual spheres by taking advantage of the ennobling influences of Western education which, even a fanatical opponent of the British rule must admit, is one of the greatest blessings conferred upon our country by England. The general awakening of the Indian mind, which presents the most interesting and instructive theme for contemplation to a student of sociology and of which the Indian National Congress may be claimed as the most encouraging manifestation, is due mainly to the elevating influences of Western education for which India will never cease to be grateful to the mighty race which, whatever its defects (and of these there are not a few), seems destined to revolutionize the fortunes of many a race upon this planet. These reflections naturally suggest themselves to our mind when we consider the state of anxious alarm with which every enlightened Indian, anxious for the reputation of his rulers as well as for the mental regeneration of his countrymen, views the short-sighted policy, first inaugurated under Lord Dufferin's régime, of withdrawing from the management of secondary and high education under the existing conditions of Indian society. We at once admit that the scheme of local self-government when fully developed must ultimately result in the transfer of educational institutions to local municipal bodies. But the process must necessarily be a slow and gradual one of adaptation of the mental and material resources of the people to the desired end. When our rulers seem unwilling to promote those salutary reforms for which the country is now ripe, it is difficult at first sight to understand the reasons which have induced Government to embark upon the disastrous policy of handing over educational institutions to impecunious bodies,—the more so especially when we recall to our mind Lord Dufferin's observations upon the educational progress of the country. It is certain that our rulers have done almost nothing for the education of their subjects as compared with what has been done in all the civilized states of Europe and America. The question then arises, why do our enlightened rulers wish to inaugurate the reactionary policy of abolishing schools and colleges or transferring them to private agencies whose pecuniary resources are certainly not of a promising character? Lord Dufferin's memory did him wonderful service when he wished to snub the Congress men in the presence of his sympathetic countrymen by suggesting to him the figures to which we have referred, but the backward condition of the country in the matter of education never deterred him for a moment from the vigorous prosecution of an aggressive policy which has crippled the resources of the Indian Government and compelled it to set aside the provincial contracts solemnly entered into and to lay its hands on the surpluses of Provincial Governments to meet the annual deficits.

The Government policy of retrenchment in Educational Department and reference to the Honourable Mr. Telang's remarks about it.

29. The Indu Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 31st December, writes:—Of all our numerous grievances of which we are constantly complaining, the one that is now by far the most urgent, pressing and anxious is the new policy of retrenchment in education which Government seems to be determined upon. The transfer of primary schools to municipalities was perhaps effected with the best of intentions; but speaking of our own presidency, we believe that the transfer threatens to be attended with the most direful consequences to the permanent interests of our people. But before that experiment has had time to fully show its results, Government seems to have resolved to withdraw from all education at any cost, and though the resolution will not be carried out summarily all at once, the beginning of the end is not imperceptible. It is impossible that Government should be unaware of the fearful consequences of the action they contemplate taking. We do not think Government can be ignorant of the mismanagement of primary schools by municipal boards and the prevailing mismanagement in most private schools. Nor can Government be unconscious of the danger of leaving their subjects without proper means of education. The policy resolved upon by Government is said to be a matter of sheer fiscal necessity. It is not probably considered as one good and desirable in itself. But it is entered upon as a choice of evils, and Government apparently consider that starving education is less harmful than starving any other branch of the administration. It must be our endeavour to convince Government that no branch of the administration could be starved with more serious consequences than education, and that it is the very last, instead of being the first, department which should be reduced. We must protest as emphatically as we can, and as often as we can, against the disposition of Government to look upon the Educational Department as their step-child, as the one department above all others which admits of retrenchment. Such a protest was made last week by the Honourable Mr. Telang in his speech at the Elphinstonian Dinner, and we draw the earnest attention of the Government and our people to Mr. Telang's words. They convey a warning and an exhortation no less to the educated people of our community than to the Government, and coming from so sober-minded a man they deserve all the serious consideration that their importance commands.

Intention of the Bombay Government to enhance the school-fees.

30. The Bombay Samáchár (100), in its issue of the 1st January, says:—The assurance conveyed by His Excellency the Governor in reply to the address from the Society of Private Institution at Kárwár that there was no intention of abolishing either the high school at that place or those at Poona, Ahmednagar and Ratnágiri is highly consolatory, but the intimation that the fees will be increased is not a little disquieting. An enhancement in the fees is sure to obstruct the spread of education that cannot be compensated for by the hope held out by His Excellency that deserving students will get education free or at reduced fees. Like other branches of the administration Government ought to have sole control of the education of the people. In European countries the Government provides every convenience for the education of the people and supplies cheap education for the poor classes. Free education is given to the Germans by their Emperor, and in one of his recent speeches Mr. Gladstone avowed his intention to make State education free on his coming into office next time. It is therefore to be hoped that the Bombay Government will not obstruct the spread of education by enhancing the school-fees.

Proposal for reduction in the cost of the Elphinstone High School.

31. A correspondent of the Jáme Jamshed (116), in its issue of the 31st December, says:—It is stated on good authority that the Director of Public Instruction has called upon the Principal of the Elphinstone High School to suggest whether the salaries of the teaching staff of the institution should be reduced or an increase should be made in the school-fees in order to curtail the cost of the institution by Rs. 9,000 per annum. The Principal is said to be in favour of the proposal for the enhancement of the fees and has recommended that the fee on the Gujaráti side of the school should be raised by one rupee per student, allowing the existing rate on the Maráthi side to remain untouched. If such a recommendation has been made it is flagrant injustice to the Gujaráti-speaking population and ought not to be adopted. The Jáme Jamshed says:—It is not right to effect any reduction in the cost of the institution. The school-fees may be slightly raised, without however making an invidious distinction between the Maráthi and Gujaráti speaking populations.

Rumour about the abolition of the Ahmedabad High School.

32. A correspondent of the Rást Goftár (91), in its issue of the 30th December, says:—It is said that the educational authorities intend to abolish the Ahmedabad High School, believing that the Mission High School and a private high school would suffice for the wants of the people. The last-named institution is not, however, established on a satisfactory footing, and under such circumstances it would be improper to close the Government high school. The people of Ahmedabad are exceedingly sorry that Mr. Jamsetji Dalál should have severed his connection with the Gujarát College. The learned Principal conducted the institution ably, but left the service because Government did not act fairly towards him.

The recent Matriculation Examination of the Bombay University and the failure of a large number of candidates in the English language paper set in it.

33. The Suryodayá (70), in its issue of the 31st December, says that the cause of the failure of 2,000 out of the total number of 3,542 candidates in the English language alone at the recent Matriculation Examination of the Bombay University must be the severe test applied by Messrs. Cassels and Doderet, two of the English Examiners, and remarks that it will be much better for Government to gain their object of discouraging education by appointing these men for life as Examiners in English in the Matriculation Examination than by reducing the expenditure on the Educational Department.

The paper in English at the Matriculation Examination of the Bombay University.

34. The Gujaráti (86), in its issue of the 30th December, says:—The present system of appointing several Examiners for the paper in English at the Matriculation Examination and then distributing the candidates among these Examiners does injustice to the former, inasmuch as some Examiners are lenient while others are over-strict. The better course is to revert to the old system of dividing the work of the preparation of the English paper between several Examiners, each of them being entrusted with the examination of the answers given to the questions set by him.

Part IV.—Railways.

Treatment of certain Native passengers on the G. I. P. Railway.

35. The Rájyabhakt (132), in its issue of the 1st January, states:—It is said that on the evening of the 22nd December Mr. Inverarity did not allow Mr. Mathurádás Liládhar Shámji to enter a first-class carriage at the Victori Terminus of the G. I. P. Railway and they came to blows. The European railway servants at Jabalpur are said to have forcibly taken money from the Násik delegates to the Indian National Congress and to have committed an assault on them and the Madras delegates. It is to be regretted that the Natives do not pay the Europeans in their own coin for the rough treatment received by them.

Part V.—Native States.

Unsatisfactory administration of the Bhávnagar State.

36. The Nyáyadarshak (127), in its issue of the 31st December, on the authority of a correspondent says:—Formerly on different occasions several Nágar Kárbháris of the Bhávnagar State took away from the State treasury jewels and ornaments worth twelve lákhs of rupees and thirty-five lákhs in cash on the plea of bribing some Government officers, appropriating themselves either a portion or the whole of the amount. During the last fifteen months, ornaments and cash to the amount of ten lákhs of rupees are said to have been taken by a person much respected by the Chief for the purpose of corrupting Government officials. The said person goes to different places several times in a year and represents to the Chief that certain officers have been paid particular sums for the purpose of getting over certain difficulties. In November last a European took rupees fifty thousand from the Bhávnagar treasury and went to Bombay in connection with the business of another European. Gagá Ozá could not have earned eighty lákhs of rupees except by such underhand means. If the Bombay Government asks the Chief in private what all this means and if the latter tells the truth, several persons will be exposed like Mr. Crawford. The Thákor spends much of his time in the company of the concubine Kesar and is led by Mr. Sims to neglect his administrative work. Unless half of the Nágar officials of the State, Mr. Sims, Dr. Barjorji and concubine Kesar are sent out of the State, the Chief and the administration are not likely to improve; and if the present state of things continues any longer, the Thákor soon be reduced to the condition in which Malhár Ráo Gáikwád found him- the administration of the State will go into the hands of the British ient.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Part I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Who are the real haters of India, whether Lords Salisbury and Dufferin or Messrs. Gladstone, Bright, &c.

1. The Poona Vaibhav (49), in its issue of the 6th January, says:—Men like Mr. Maclean, Lord Salisbury, Lord Dufferin and the editor of the Pioneer, who speak in disparagement of our ambition, are said to be our enemies; but we do not take this view. Messrs. Hume, Gladstone, Bright and others of their opinion are really the persons who are doing injury to India. It is the firm determination of the people of England that the people of India shall not have a particle of administrative power, howsoever learned and qualified they may be, that they shall never be allowed to touch the sword howsoever loyal they may be, and that the British army shall never be diminished. In brief, the British rule in India is intended solely for the benefit of the people of England without any regard being paid to principles of justice or equity, and such measures as are conducive to this object are strictly to be enforced. These facts are so patent as not to be doubted by any except learned fools, and they ought to be deeply impressed on the minds of our countrymen. Public associations and the National Congress are shams and will be of no avail. Every one should remember that there is no awakening a man who pretends to be asleep and should shape his conduct according to the determinations of the English nation. Notwithstanding this, Mr. Gladstone and men of his type create false hopes in us and mislead us. We are in vain roaming in a desert in pursuit of mirage instead of taking the right direction. Our exertions are therefore futile. So long as we were unacquainted with Western education and there was no public opinion amongst us, our sweet-talking rulers said, "Be educated and unanimously make a reasonable demand and the generous English nation will accede to it." We have done all that and our rulers have now shown themselves in their true colours. They plainly say, "The people of England will not give you the smallest privilege. You had better canvass your social topics, that is to say, hold large meetings and discuss whether women should be shaved or not. Contend in this way among yourselves and sit on one another's breast, and we will applaud you and enjoy the spectacle; and when you have tired each other down we shall ourselves appropriate the subject of your contention." Lord Dufferin says, "Under British Government one class cannot predominate over another." Quite true. In the dreadful conflagration that has come from the west, high or low, small or large, rich or poor, educated or uneducated, are all reduced to ashes. How can one then predominate over another? How can there be justice when warrants are selfishly issued against persons who preach against the drinking of liquor and when authority is used for suppressing temperance leagues? What compassion can there be where useful and revered cows, whose safety was guaranteed even under the Moguls, are hewed and slaughtered? What happiness can there be where, while half-fed people are rolling and tossing through pain, becoming lank and meagre for want of salt, and shivering for want of fuel and are being starved to death on account of the exportation of wheat and the slaughter of cattle by cruel people, voluminous reports one after another are submitted asserting the well-being and prosperity of the subjects? Who could make us happy and what was Lord Dufferin's power after all? Who would give us privileges for the mere asking? Wake up, you learned fools, even now and look around with your eyes wide open. Don't you run about in pursuit of a delusion. Put the unction of Lord Dufferin's speech into your eyes. Bear well in mind that His Lordship's opinion is the opinion of the English nation. The Proclamation of 1858 is useless. Lord Dufferin's speech is the real charter of our nation. Learn it by heart and shape your conduct in conformity with it. It is explicit enough as to how far the English people will do anything willingly for you; you need only look with your eyes open. There is much meaning stored in the sentence, "The police practise tyranny over the people, because they are impotent." This expression of opinion by Lord Dufferin is worth a lakh of rupees. He has only expounded the truth and pointed out the right path. His obligations cannot be adequately acknowledged. He has not said that the Hindus are ineligible for any particular privileges. What he has said in many places is that the English people will give them none. Why should not such a magnanimous person be hailed then? When people like Mr. Gladstone perish and the country is full of great-minded Dufferins, then only the day of our rise may be said to have approached, and hence we wish all success to Lord Dufferin.

Gloomy condition of the Indian finance and the necessity for the advice of the people in the matter.

2. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 6th January, writes:—Of all matters making up the entity called the administration of the country, the subject of finance is the most troublesome. Not only do the existing sources of revenue show a tendency to be slippery and make it necessary that they should be supplemented by new ones, but circumstances are thickening over which the Government has no control and which entirely upset all calculation. The increasing anxiety of the position has long been causing a deep sense of responsibility, and the time has now arrived when it is admitted on all hands that the people should be made to share in and lighten that responsibility. It seems that Lord Dufferin felt this necessity and himself proposed to the Home Government the scheme which would make it practicable to take the advice of the people in the real sense of the expression. Also the people with their increasing political perception have felt the pinch and are strengthening the hands of the authorities by preferring unanimous demands in this direction. No doubt some parties have tried to give a sinister appearance to this demand. But looking more broadly and apart from interested or misguided motives, it will be seen that it is not so much the wire-pulling on the part of individuals as the time itself that is responsible for the present attitude taken by the public in India.

Approval of the determination of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne not to go from Calcutta till May.

3. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 5th January, writes:—If the report be correct that the Government of India will not go to Simla this year before May, His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's first words in Calcutta may be accepted as more literal than metaphorical. If the new Viceroy makes such a concession it will give him a start in his Indian career which very few Viceroys have had. It will popularise him at once with all classes except that really 'microscopic minority' which looks forward to the Simla season for enjoyment and pleasure. Not only in India, but even in England, wherever the question has been understood, the system of government from the hills has been condemned. Public opinion in this country is becoming stronger and more unanimous on this subject. It cannot for a moment be denied that the circumstances under which the hill system was introduced have completely changed, and that the time has come, if not for the abandonment of the hill system, at least for a modification of it. If His Excellency Lord Lansdowne stays in Calcutta till May, it will be a concession to popular wishes which will be appreciated throughout the country.

Annual exodus to Simla.

4. In noticing the Allahabad telegram about the desire expressed by the Secretary of State for India for fixing dates for opening and closing the Secretariat offices at Calcutta, the Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 8th January, says:—The Secretary of State's despatch on the subject is said to fix the 15th of May and the 15th of November for the removal of the Government offices to and from Simla. If this statement be true, Lord Cross's despatch does not make material change in the present situation. The period of the stay of the Government of India at Simla is curtailed by two and a half months only, and though this will be of some service to the traders at Calcutta, no material benefit will be derived by the country in general from the Secretary's order. [The Hitechchhu (80) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 10th January, expresses similar sentiments. In writing on the same subject the Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 8th January, says:—The Government of India ought to stay at the capital city throughout the year or the greater portion of it, but those who have experience of the climate of Calcutta will never insist on the Viceroy and his Councillors staying in that city in the hot months, and such a rule as Lord Cross wishes to make will prevent able English statesmen from accepting the Indian Viceroyalty, and if it is to be insisted upon, Bombay ought to be made the metropolis of India, as being nearer England by about eight days' journey and healthier than Calcutta, and being within easy reach of Mátherán and other hill sanitaria.

New Year's honours.

5. The Rást Goftár (83), in its issue of the 6th January, writes :—The list of deserving names excluded from the Honours Gazette being larger than that of those included in it, it is beginning to be looked upon as more honourable to be out of it than to be in it. We shall not grudge our congratulations to each and every recipient of the fresh batch honoured on the eve of the New Year just begun, and it is simply for their consideration that we throw out the suggestion that, when titles and decorations go by favour instead of by merit in a majority of cases, and when influence on the part of those who seek for honours overreaches the self-restraint of those who wish that honours should come seeking them, is it, or is it not, a greater happiness to rank with the deserving ones left out, than with the undeserving ones who have scrambled in? After expressing great satisfaction with the titles bestowed upon the Honourable Mr. Scoble, Captain Hext, Mr. F. W. Stevens, and Dr. Bhándárkar, the Rást continues :—Our only regret is that the very superior claims of Khán Bahádur Muncherji Murzban should still remain unnoticed though he is the first of our successful Native architects to whom Bombay owes so much of its beauty, and whose zealous efforts in a variety of ways in the interests of the public are so well known. [Several newspapers of this week make similar remarks.]

Approval of the honours conferred by Government on Dr. Bhándárkar and Mr. Mudaliyár.

6. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 7th January, writes :—Among the Natives upon whom the title of C.I.E. has been bestowed, we find Dr. R. G. Bhándárkar. We are glad Government have recognized in this manner the services which the learned Doctor has rendered to the cause of Oriental research. Mr. Sálem Rámaswámy Mudaliyár's services as a member of the late Public Service Commission have earned him the personal distinction of Ráo Bahádur. This, again, is a very good selection. While congratulating the Government upon the wisdom they have shown in conferring distinctions on two such gentlemen as Dr. Bhándárkar and Mr. Mudaliyár, we feel bound to notice the omission of Mr. Budrudin Tyabji's name from the New Year's Honours' list. The Government of India has bestowed titles upon several of the Mahomedans who have of late endeavoured to promote education among their fellow-religionists. Mr. Budrudin has on this side of India taken a most active part in organising schools for Mahomedan boys under the auspices of the Anjuman-i-Islam, and Government would have done well to recognize his services. [The Sudhárak (17) of the 7th and the Bakul (22) of the 6th January also approve of the honour conferred upon Dr. Bhándárkar.]

New Year's day honours and Gujarát.

7. The Gujarát Mitră (79), in its issue of the 6th January, says :—It is to be much regretted that Government should have been very stingy in the bestowal of honours on the deserving men of Gujarát. At the recent distribution of the New Year's day honours, only one Gujaráti was found deserving of the title of Ráo Sáheb. There are numbers of persons either in Government service or out of it who are fully deserving of such favours from Government.

The Arms' Act and the necessity for its relaxation.

8. The Arunodayă (20), in its issue of the 6th January, says :—Though it is not safe for a foreign Government like the British to repeal the Arms' Act altogether in India, yet it is necessary to relax its operation which is at present very stern. As a person paying an annual land revenue of Rs. 50 or upwards is qualified to be a voter, so there should be some such limit with reference to the Arms' Act. A man of ordinary respectability should not be required to obtain a license for possessing arms, so also a cultivator who cultivates his own land should require no license. Such men are considerate and no danger need be apprehended from them. If the respectable portion of the subject people are allowed to use arms without a license, they will entertain much respect for their rulers and can easily protect themselves from the depredations of wild animals. It is natural for foreign rulers to fear that an indiscriminate permission to possess arms may create to them enemies. But though it is true that India must become free some day or other, the time has not yet come and is far distant as Government and the well-wishers of the country must admit, and it does not appear proper for Government to raise that question at present, or to refuse to relax the Arms' Act because the relaxation might prove harmful two hundred years hence. If the people be kept happy and contented and their prosperity be promoted, the time for the independence of India will be deferred or may never come at all. We therefore hope that Government will slacken the rules of the Arms' Act as it is desirable to do so for more reasons than one.

The Government officials and the Indian National Congress.

9. Writing about the Indian National Congress, the Subodh Patrika (16), in its issue of the 6th January, says:—Our present state is very critical and adverse. The Government is contemplating to create quarrels amongst us by patting the Musalmáns and others on the back. Principal Government officers have changed their tactics and have attempted to threaten and overawe the people. So also it is under contemplation to give up the work of public instruction on which depends all civilization and thus to uproot the Congress movement by throwing the people into darkness again. Moreover, the Government has bought over the Anglo-Indian newspapers, which are throwing dust into the eyes of the people of England by making misrepresentations on the subject of the Congress. In fact, every means is being tried to shut our mouths and to prevent the English nation from taking notice of us. Though the English nation is great and noble, yet it relies too much upon the officials and is very slow in doing acts of justice. This defect has been very prejudicial to it. A hundred years ago English officers by their wanton behaviour and by misrepresentations made to people in England, picked up a quarrel with their American cousins. The latter were in every way qualified and yet they were obstinately refused the right of returning representatives to Parliament in spite of their repeated demands for it. In the end, matters took a serious turn and led to the declaration of war, which ended in victory to the Americans and loss of domain to the English. At the present moment there is no empire so happy and good like the United States. England has been similarly quarrelling with Ireland for the last seven hundred years and hundreds of millions have been expended in keeping order in that small island which demands a separate Parliament of its own. The Government officials in Ireland have created factions amongst themselves and the Liberals feel that the demands of the Irish people ought to be granted. There is no doubt that they will be granted within two or three years. In short, continuous exertions must be made to secure redress of grievances from the English people. Interrupted and temporary agitation is of no use, and, therefore, this movement must be maintained steadily and wisely. This requires suitable leaders, and the work of enlightening public opinion ought to be carried on with great vigour.

His Excellency the Marquis of Dufferin and the Indian National Congress.

10. The Vrittadhára (69), in its issue of the 3rd January, says:—It is true that His Excellency the Marquis of Dufferin attacked the Indian National Congress about the time of his leaving the country, but he did so because he was misinformed or because his mind was prejudiced by others about that body. If he had taken the Congress into his confidence and correctly informed himself of its aims and objects, he would have seen that the movement was quite innocent and was intended to educate the masses and to render assistance to our rulers in the administration of the country. His Excellency's far-sightedness and great statesmanship were brought to the notice of the people in the arrangements he made for maintaining peace in the country. It is our misfortune that the whole of His Excellency's time in India should have been spent in maintaining peace in the country and that he should have found no leisure to consider the rights of the people; for, otherwise, he would certainly have made some concessions to them.

11. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 7th January, writes:—So far the Indian National Congress at Allahabad has proved a success. It has perplexed its enemies, and raised the spirits of its friends. It has further proved that the country is grateful to the disinterested, self-sacrificing, self-abnegating and devoted labours of Mr. Hume, whose popularity is daily increasing. Sir Auckland Colvin may hereafter write pamphlets denouncing Mr. Hume and the Congress, but recent events,—events more recent than his letter to Mr. Hume,—ought to go some way in convincing him that a righteous cause cannot be put down by a misrepresentation of facts such as he was plainly guilty of when he quoted a passage from Mr. Hume's pamphlet for the purpose of bringing home to the Congress the charge of sedition and omitted to quote another passage, which most plainly showed that the former passage could not bear the interpretation Sir Auckland had put upon it.

12. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 6th January, writes:—On the whole, we think the fourth Indian National Congress was a greater success than any of its predecessors. This steady improvement year after year augurs well for the future of the cause. The organization at Allahabad appears to have been perfect so far as it went. And this is saying a great deal indeed when we bear in mind the difficulties created by Sir Auckland Colvin's letter to Mr. Hume, and Lord Dufferin's departing kick at a movement of the progress of which he seems to have grown needlessly impatient.

Usefulness of the Indian National Congress.

13. The Shri Shiváji (61), in its issue of the 4th January, says:—Although the Indian National Congress stands condemned by Sir Auckland Colvin and His Excellency the Marquis of Dufferin, yet men like Mr. Gladstone have not only approved of it but are glad at it. Questions about the Congress are asked in Parliament and it is likely that sooner or later the resolutions passed by the Congress will be discussed by it. Statesmen like Sir W. Hunter are advising the rulers of India to utilize the increasing power of the Congress in the administration of India. There is no reason to doubt the usefulness of the Congress and of the expenditure incurred every year on its account.

Kolhápur authorities and their conduct towards the students in the local Rájárám High School who took a leading part in raising subscriptions for the Indian National Congress.

14. The Pratod (52), of the 7th January, learns from the Vidya Vilás (67) newspaper of Kolhápur that the meeting held by the students of the Rájárám High School, Kolhápur, for raising subscriptions in aid of the Indian National Congress was brought to the notice of the high authorities in the State and that after an enquiry into the matter it has been proposed that of the students who receive education with support from the State those who took a leading part in the movement should be deprived of the State support, and remarks:—If the statement above alluded to be true, our readers can imagine the impartiality and the love of justice on the part of the Kolhápur State authorities. The Indian National Congress is not a rebellious movement, but will, on the contrary, create more friendly feelings between Europeans and Natives. But who is to understand this? As long as narrow-minded Englishmen who are opposed to the regeneration of the people of India have a hand in the administration of the country, they will harass Natives in this manner. In one respect it is good that Government officers should thus annoy us; for, unless we are teased, the way to emancipate ourselves will not suggest itself to our minds.

The delegates from the Gujarát province to the Indian National Congress and a hint to the Reception Committee on the point.

15. The Káthiáwár Times (82), in its issue of the 9th January, writes:—The Rást Goftár informs us that among the three or four delegates elected to represent the capital of Gujarát at the Congress which assembled recently at Allahabad one was a boy of twenty-two who had just passed his P. E. Examination, and the other was the editor of the Rájyabhakta. At a good many places worthless men, who hardly know how to read and write, selected themselves to represent localities at their own sweet will, and, therefore, it was no wonder that the very dregs of society appeared at the assemblage as delegates to do what they hardly knew. We are told that a good many went to Allahabad with the pure object of bathing in the Ganges and washing away their sins, and that those whose accumulation of sins was not sufficient to justify their going this time had postponed their departure to a time when a similar Congress would, in all possibility, be held at Allahabad next time. We might hint to the Reception Committee that if no proper precautions are taken pattáwálás would be smuggled in as delegates at the next Congress, and somebody will have to second his own pattáwálá's propositions.

A suggestion to Government to abolish the posts of Commissioner, C. D., and the Inspector-General of Police, Bombay.

16. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 6th January, writes:—So the persistent representations of the Native press for the abolition of the Commissionership for the Central Division, which originated in the appointment of a Commissioner to superintend famine relief works and other kindred affairs in 1877-78, are likely to be realised. During the late famine this appointment was urgently needed and nobody could object to its creation, but our apparent financial elasticity, or rather the increasing scope of patronage, perhaps induced Government to stick to it up to the present. Another fat berth has been that of the Inspector-General of Police, which though created for a special purpose now flourishes in all its fullness. Before the famine of 1877-78 these posts did not exist and the superintendence of the Police Department and of the revenue of the whole presidency, except perhaps that of Sind, was carried on with as much efficiency and thoroughness as they are done now. We are not aware of any strong case being made out for the maintenance of either of the posts we refer to. If the abolition of the Commissionership is quite on the cards, the abolition will give some relief to the tax-payer, and impress the people that their rulers are really in earnest in the matter of the curtailment of expenditure. So far as the preservation of life and property is concerned, people have no grounds to think that it is in any way better now than it had been when the management of the police was left to the care of the Revenue Commissioners. We are persuaded to believe that this new police post has been as unnecessary an appendage as the Central Commissionership, and, therefore, in the interests of our finance ought to be done away with.

Approval of the intended abolition of the post of Commissioner, C. D.

17. The Poona Vaibhav (49) of the 6th January is gratified to learn that Government intend abolishing the post of Commissioner, C. D., after the Crawford case is disposed of, and says that they will not do anything amiss in taking the same course with regard to the post of the Director of Public Instruction or of an Educational Inspector with a view to save the High Schools from the impending danger.

Comments on the action of Government in the Crawford case.

18. The Bakul (22), in its issue of the 6th January, says:—The case for Government and the address of the counsel for Mr. Crawford have been concluded and one can easily see what good or bad result the expenditure of so much time and money will bring about. On the whole, the Government relied upon idle tattlers and the statements of the enemies of Mr. Crawford and lowered itself to a condition similar to that in the case against Malhárráo Gáikwád. Did the Government suppose that Mr. Crawford, who has very cleverly discharged his duties consecutively for the last thirty-five years and has made a name for himself, might have taken bribes, supposing for a moment that he did take them, without due care and caution and leaving behind complete documentary evidence? Having so many barristers and clever officers in its service, could not the Government ascertain whether there would be a return for an expenditure of five lákhs? Moreover, if there was a suspicion against Mr. Crawford there was the strong charge of indebtedness against him which he has admitted. If, therefore, matters had been settled quietly and privately, so many Natives would not have had their characters exposed. It might be asked whether there were not Native offenders at any rate. The reply is that there have been attempts to take revenge or to promote self-interest by somehow or other exposing others, or to protect one's self or relatives by making a show of telling the truth. The Government should now at any rate take steps to terminate these things in a good manner.

Desire expressed on all hands to see the Crawford Commission closed.

19. The Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 6th January, writes:—The inquiry into the alleged malpractices of Mr. Crawford, Commissioner, C. D., now under suspension, is being pushed forward, and it may be reasonably expected that within about ten days the inquiry will have been closed. Whether or not any fresh Commission will be instituted to inquire into a fresh set of charges, it is impossible to say just now. There are all kinds of rumours afloat, one of them being that it is intended to proceed against Mr. Crawford in a Criminal Court. The very absurdity of this rumour is sufficient to discredit it altogether. We for our part feel satisfied that there can be really no foundation whatever for these rumours, and that the Bombay Government will be surely content with the present protracted proceedings. The enquiry has already lasted for nearly three months, and if as a result of it Mr. Crawford should be acquitted, there would be very little chance indeed of securing his conviction on a fresh set of charges, which must inevitably be of the same character as those already inquired into. We are disposed to think that both the Bombay Government and the public must be quite sick of the inquiry, and that every one must be desiring to see it closed as early as possible. As some of our readers would like to read the concluding portion of Mr. Inverarity's able address delivered last week, we reproduce it below from the Bombay dailies. It was very feelingly delivered, and will doubtless strike the reader as such. Here follows the address.

The Crawford case and its outcome.

20. The Jagad-hitechchhu (13), in its issue of the 5th January, says:—There has been restlessness everywhere since the Crawford case began. Mr. Crawford was suspended, he made an attempt to abscond and was arrested, complaints were lodged against him and a Commission sat to inquire into them. Evidence for the prosecution was tendered and it was criticised by the counsel for the accused. Witnesses are now being examined for the defence. From beginning to end the views of the public regarding the charges against Mr. Crawford have changed from time to time and numerous rumours have been given currency to from day to day. Mr. Inverarity conducted the proceedings on behalf of his client in an excellent manner and certainly he has spared no pains to support his client's cause. There were in all 32 charges against Mr. Crawford, 100 witnesses were examined and 500 exhibits were put in evidence. The eloquence of Mr. Inverarity threatens to pull to the ground the whole of the evidence produced by Government with such assiduity. If Mr. Crawford is found guilty of taking bribes he will be punished for it; if he is acquitted, the stain on his name will be removed. But this case being connected with Natives, we are obliged to write a few words about it. We are pained by the utterances of the barrister for the defence like the following: "The Chief of Bhor did a shameless act," "Some Mámlatdárs did a nasty piece of business by giving bribes," &c., for neither the Chief of Bhor nor the Mámlatdárs are much to blame for being compelled through helplessness to have recourse to the foul expedient of giving bribes, but the fault lies with the system which compelled them to act so. Well, the only result of the case has been that Natives, especially those of rank and position, have had their character stained and we have got unworthy epithets.

Expression of dissatisfaction at the appointment of Mr. Candy as an Acting Judge of the Bombay High Court.

21. The Gujaráti (78), in its issue of the 6th January, writes:—We were the first to express dissatisfaction at the appointment of Mr. Candy to officiate for Mr. Justice Birdwood during his absence, not because of his unfitness for the post, but because of the supersession involved in it of an eminent Native District and Sessions Judge who is senior both to Mr. Justice Parsons and Mr. Candy. A Sholápur correspondent justly complains in the columns of the Bombay Gazette of the present attitude of indifference on the part of the Native public and the exponents of public opinion. Mr. Tagore has acquitted himself creditably of the onerous duties devolving upon him in the Sholápur and Bijápur Districts and which were found to tax the energies of even a European Judge like Mr. Druitt, who was compelled to go on furlough to Europe for the benefit of his health. He has already distinguished himself by his judicial acumen and by a conscientious discharge of his heavy and responsible duties, and we are really grieved to find that our enlightened Governor should have thought fit to depart from the generous policy followed by Lord Ripon and even by Lord Dufferin in filling up vacancies in the High Court at Calcutta. [Several newspapers of this week express similiar sentiments.]

Appointment of Mr. Gupte as Curator, Government Central Book Depôt, disapproved.

22. The Yajdán Parast (140), in its issue of the 6th January, says:—The appointment of Mr. Gupte as Curator, Government Central Book Depôt, in supersession of the claims of employés in the Educational Department has justly given rise to much adverse comment. Mr. Gupte is known in connection with public exhibitions, and had no connection whatever with the Educational Department. It is not right that old officers of this department should be disappointed by conferring the place on an outsider like Mr. Gupte. [The Pársi Punch (121) of the same date expresses similar sentiments, observing that Mr. Gupte got the post because he could command recommendations from Sir George Birdwood and His Excellency Lord Reay.]

Approval of the contemplated order prohibiting the presentation of cakes, fruit, &c., to public officers.

23. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 6th January, writes:—Government might do worse than issue the contemplated orders forbidding the presentation to and acceptance by public officers of cakes, fruit and flowers. It is moonshine to say that such gifts promote good feeling, except perhaps where the parties live on more or less equal terms. They generally serve to nourish a servile spirit and demoralise the relations which ought to exist between upright rulers and self-respecting subjects. Good feeling results from the existence in the former of right principles and the spirit of sympathy, which admittedly are never lost on the latter in India. We certainly know of European officers possessing the requisite moral attributes, but refusing on principle to accept from their Native dependents even a petal of a flower, who inspire and receive the highest esteem and love. At any rate, nothing can be more desirable than to prevent absolutely the menials of an officer's establishment from having anything to do with his Native visitors, except announcing them to his sáheb, or from touching anything from them except their cards. No man is a hero to his valet, and it is useless to complain; the menials do not fail to take advantage of their position, and complaint would only make matters worse. From the highest to the lowest all suffer from these harpies, though the nuisance had abated during recent years. The Native members of the Commission which tried Malharráo Gáikwád, were reported freely to have remarked to each other that the Mahárája had overlooked the truth that the master of a house can be reached only through his door-keeper. This rule applies to all and complaint can, as a rule, only aggravate the trouble of the visitors. His Excellency Lord Reay, therefore, has correctly perceived a source of abuse here, and we would humbly suggest the issue of the proposed prohibitory orders.

Scarcity of food and fodder in the Mával Táluka of the Poona District and the misery of the rayats.

24. The Poona Vaibhav (49), in its issue of the 6th January, says:—The oppression practised by Government in the Forest Department over the people is such as nobody can adequately describe. As Bhils, Rámoshis and other badmashes have no hesitation in killing persons in a forest for the sake of two or four annas worth of clothing, so for a paltry sum of revenue Government is murdering hundreds of thousands of men by appropriating pasture lands in villages and charging fees for grazing cattle in Government reserved forests which poor cultivators can hardly afford to pay. Permission has been given to fell trees of all kinds except eighteen, which, however, ignorant rustics can hardly make out. Cattle required for agricultural purposes can be grazed free of charge, but she-buffaloes and cows must be paid for. On account of this restriction cultivators and their beasts are starving for want of food and fodder. Last week about two or three thousand rayats of the Mával Táluka came to Poona to seek redress, but they were told by the Collector and the Commissioner that they had no power in the matter. Poor people! where should they go to now for redress? Who will take them to His Excellency the Governor? How will they find the means of subsistence? O God, have pity on these miserable people, and inspire the Governor with a desire to relieve them of their hard condition.

Distress at Vágra and Jambusar in the Broach District.

25. The Broach Mitrá (93), in its issue of the 9th January, says:—No land whatever was cultivated this year at Vágra and Jambusar on account of a scanty fall of rain, and the people of those places are suffering great distress. The scarcity of food has increased the crime of highway robbery near Jambusar and A'mod, and the people are much frightened thereby.

Supply of copies of new Bills brought before the local as well as Supreme Legislative Councils to leading newspapers recommended.

26. The Bodh Sudhákar (6), in its issue of the 9th January, recommends Government to send copies of new Bills brought before the local as well as Supreme Legislative Councils to the leading newspapers for their opinions thereon, as was done for a few days during the Viceroyalty of Lord Ripon, and says that Government should particularly follow this course in the case of the proposed reforms in the Police Act in which the interests of the rayats are vitally involved.

Remarks on Mr. Lee-Warner's address delivered in the Frámji Cowasji Institute, Bombay

27. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 10th January, writes:—Mr. Lee-Warner's address on the powers and responsibilities of criticism with which the Bombay audience was favoured in the Frámji Cowasji Institute on the 8th instant was indeed of a character that could be expected from a man of such a high literary renown as Mr. Lee-Warner. Perhaps this was the first time that Mr. Lee-Warner put in an appearance before the public. And judging of his performance by the canons laid down by himself it may be safely said that the lecture was a happy one, at all events from a literary and scholarly point of view. The address has three aspects, the historical, the philosophical and the illustrative. In so far as the historical aspect goes, we shall not quarrel with the veracity of the lecturer. In its philosophical aspect the address may, to a certain extent, call for an examination. And the illustrative aspect may indeed be open to criticism, especially as regards its suggestive feature. However, the address as a whole was no doubt an intellectual feast and was a delight to the mind though not quite to the ear. It is moreover full of hints which can never be too carefully learnt either by the bureaucracy or by the Anglo-Indian press. It contains also a wholesome caution to the so-called social reformers, who pose themselves as the representatives of the people, when in reality they can at best be said only to claim a partial representation even of their own selves.

28. In noticing Mr. Lee-Warner's address on "the duties and responsibilities of criticism," the Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 10th January, says:—Mr. Lee-Warner's general remarks on the press criticism apply to all countries alike, and his observation that it ought to be confined within the quadrilateral of truth, practical sense, honesty and moderation cannot be gainsaid. Coming to the particular remarks of the lecturer, it may be remarked that they revive the old question, whether the natives of India should effect their social or political reform first. There is a difference of opinion on this question among the Natives as well as among the Europeans, but both agree that it is not beneficial to effect only political reform, which ought to be accompanied by social amelioration. Many Europeans and a few experienced Natives are of opinion that social reform should precede political progress. On the other hand, discerning Natives and Europeans hold that both kinds of reform should be attended to, taking up first what would be more easy to accomplish and with its help pushing on the other reform. The latter view is sound and practicable, as will be seen from the proceedings of the fourth meeting of the Indian National Congress which were conducted with moderation and practical sense. The Congress as well as Native statesmen are well aware that social reform is not so easy as political reform, and that the former can very conveniently follow the latter. This is made indispensable by the peculiar conditions of Native society. Caste distinctions and old manners and customs make it necessary that the different communities should make social reform in the way best suited to each, and this is a task that cannot be expected to be rapidly accomplished. Mr.

Lee-Warner's address is extremely able and most suggestive and deserves the thanks of the Native public. [The Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the same date, makes similar remarks.]

A complaint against Mr. Fraser, Assistant Collector, Násik.

29. The Sinnar correspondent of the Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 7th January, says that Mr. Fraser, Assistant Collector, Násik, hears cases up to 9 P.M. to the great inconvenience and expense of the petitioners and litigants from distant places, and that the latter have sometimes to call at his office for days together before their cases are disposed of, requests Government to redress this grievance of the people, and remarks that if a Native officer had behaved like Mr. Fraser, he would have been called upon to give an explanation.

Alleged improper conduct of a young Tálukdár of Gujarát.

30. The Nyáyadarshak (119), in its issue of the 7th January, states on the authority of an anonymous communication :—A young Tálukdár of Gujarát has fallen into bad company, and conducts himself improperly under advice of his evil associates. A few days ago the said Tálukdár visited the village of Goraj in the Sánand Táluka and called upon a farmer to pay him Rs. 500. The latter refused to pay the amount and was thereupon severely beaten. The farmer has been prohibited from laying a complaint against the assaulter. The said Tálukdár visited also the village of Korat and called upon the Mukhi to pay a certain amount, and threatened him on his refusal to comply with the demand. The young Tálukdár is given to drinking and has kept a concubine. It is to be hoped that Mr. James, the Collector of Ahmedabad, will enquire into the truth of these allegations.

Capsizing of a boat in the Revdanda harbour on the 1st January 1889, and a request to Government to enquire into the matter.

31. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 10th January, publishes the following account sent to it by a correspondent, and requests Government to enquire into the matter. When the s. s. Zuari touched the Revdanda harbour on the 1st January 1889, to receive passengers, about 20 passengers put off for the steamer in a boat. But before they could get on board the steamer, the latter suddenly started, giving such a shock to the boat that it immediately capsized. The captain of the steamer was good enough to stop it at once and picked up 12 out of 20 passengers that had fallen into the water. These twelve were clinging to the anchor chain of the steamer when they were picked up, but the captain did not make any attempt to ascertain the fate of the remaining eight. Statements of the twelve persons were then taken by the Customs officers and the latter asked them to attend when summoned to do so. Nothing is known about the missing persons.

Complaints about mismanagement in the hospitals in Bombay.

32. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 6th January, writes :—Has it ever struck the Bombay Medical Union to look into the complaints made, from time to time, as to the mismanagement alleged to be prevalent in our hospitals? Some of these complaints are very old, those, for instance, referring to want of attention on the part of the medical officers in charge, the employment of inefficient and dishonest servants who neglect and even ill-treat patients and keep the wards in a far from sanitary condition. In these respects, as also in the matter of regularity, the officers seem to be under very little control. Quite recently we heard of instances of inattention ending in serious results. Surely some means ought to be found of bringing responsibility home to the officers and of utilizing the resources of our hospitals, if not in a humane, at least in a businesslike spirit.

A gang of Beluchis moving in the Konkan and a request to Government in connection with them.

33. The Kesari (39), in its issue of the 8th January, states that it has learnt from a private letter that a band of Beluchis is moving in the Konkan, and that they being tumultuous the people are sore afraid of them, and requests Government to take steps in time to restore order.

Remarks on a petition of hackney cartmen in Belgaum to the District Collector, against the application of the Public Land Conveyance Act to Belgaum.

34. The Belgaum Samáchár (23), in its issue of the 7th January, refers to a petition of the owners of bullock carts in Belgaum to the District Collector praying for the withdrawal of the Public Land Conveyance Act from that city, describes the good the Act has done to the public by improving the condition of carts and bullocks since its application, and remarks that the Collector will commit a mistake if, through pity for the poor cartmen, he complies with their request, depriving the District Superintendent of Police of the power of issuing licenses for and of supervision of these carts.

Police in the Dohad Táluka of the Panch Maháls District.

35. The Chakravák (96), in its issue of the 7th January, says:—It is said that the policemen who go on duty from village to village in the Dohad Táluka of the Panch Maháls District call upon the village patels to feed them, and the latter find it very hard to do so since they themselves are severely suffering from scarcity of corn caused by a failure of the rains. The Mámlatdár of the táluka will, it is hoped, remove the evil.

Adulteration of butter and use of false weights and scales in selling it in Dhulia.

36. The Khándesh Chitragupta (40) of Dhulia, in its issue of the 6th January, says that the local traders do not only adulterate butter for increasing its weight, but use false scales and weights in selling it, and requests the local police to direct their attention to this matter.

PART II.—Education.

The Honourable Mr. Telang's speech at the gathering of the Elphinstonians, on the educational policy of Government.

37. The Gujarát Gazette (77), in its issue of the 10th January, writes:—The Honourable Mr. K. T. Telang in a speech delivered by him before the last gathering of the Elphinstonians thus spoke of the proposed retrenchment in the Government expenditure on education:—The late Sir Alexander Grant, who was a great educationist, cried himself hoarse, if he might so describe it, while asking Government for two per cent. of the revenue of the presidency for the Educational Department over which he so ably presided. They had not reached that beggarly amount yet. And nevertheless the Government of India has just issued a resolution announcing what he could not help calling a retrograde and even disastrous policy, inasmuch as it stated that the duty of Government in regard to education was to withdraw from its management as fast as possible, and to reduce its pecuniary allowance as much as possible. This was a doctrine which has been solemnly and authoritatively enunciated in the last resolution of the Government of India. He charged the Government with committing what he considered to be a stupendous error. And he hoped he was not doing them injustice by misinterpreting their declaration of policy. But a more mischievous, a more erroneous doctrine—a doctrine which was more calculated to produce the greatest disaster in the country—could not possibly be imagined.

Exhortation to Bráhmans to undertake secondary education and to leave high or collegiate education to Government.

38. The Poona Vaibhav (49), in its issue of the 6th January, philosophises on the nature of domestic happiness even in poverty, upbraids Bráhmans for selling their independence for the sake of money by accepting Government service, and advises them not to betray meanness by imploring Government to keep up their high schools but to open their own private high schools throughout the country, to devote themselves to their duty as Bráhmans of acquiring and imparting knowledge and to give such secular, moral and religious education to their pupils as will create in them bodily and mental independence, self-respect and patriotism. This arrangement, says the paper, will enable Government to divert their scanty funds from secondary to high education, which the Natives are hardly qualified enough to impart without their assistance.

Approval of the cancellation of the order prohibiting admission of boys into the Poona High School.

39. The Shri Shiváji (61), in its issue of the 4th January, is glad to hear of the cancellation of the order prohibiting the admission of new students into the Poona High School, and says that the order seems to be the result of the reconsideration of the matter by Government and that they should finally resolve to keep the High School intact and remove the anxiety of the people.

PART III.—Railways.

Railway extension in India.

40. The Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 8th January, says:—Several deputations waited upon Lord Lansdowne in London before His Lordship's departure for India and a deputation from the Bombay Chamber of Commerce did the same on his arrival at this city, recommending an extension of railways in India. But the experience gained in the case of the Nizám's Guaranteed State Railway, which is worked at a heavy loss, ought to make the Government of India very cautious in sanctioning new railway lines and ought to induce it to retain proper control on the working expenses of a guaranteed line. A movement is said to be set afoot by a Native capitalist of Dhulia for forming a company for the construction of a guaranteed railway line from Chálisgaon to Dhulia. It is to be hoped that careful enquiries will be made by the Government of India in connection with the prospects of the proposed line, and that if the enterprise promises well, the necessary guarantee will be given in order that the Native capitalists may be encouraged to undertake such works.

A complaint against the Southern Mahratta Railway.

41. The Dnyán Ságar (28), in its issue of the 7th January, says that not a day passes without its hearing complaints from passengers by the Southern Mahratta Railway about want of light and overcrowding of passengers in railway carriages and the consequent thefts frequently committed in them, and about frequent accidents to trains owing to cattle straying on the line for want of fencing along its sides, and requests the railway authorities to remove the causes of these complaints.

PART IV.—Municipalities.

The agitation caused at Surat by the order issued by the Municipal authorities to close the underground privies.

42. The Gujaráti (78), in its issue of the 6th January, says:—A great agitation has been created at Surat by the notices issued by the Municipality ordering that the old cesspool privies of the town should be replaced by new privies with arrangements for the removal of the night-soil. A petition protesting against the above order is being largely signed for submission to the Corporation. The Municipal Commissioners ought to remember the Surat ryots of 1878 which, though believed to have been caused by the license-tax, were really given rise to by the conduct of the then Municipal authorities. For the purpose of imposing new taxes, forms were issued for entering therein information distasteful to the people such as the names of their daughters and daughters-in-law, their occupation and other petty matters. This gave rise to an agitation among the people that afterwards assumed the form of riots. The notices issued in 1888 are similar to the forms issued in 1878, and have caused a similar agitation among the people. That this agitation may not grow and lead to serious consequences, Government ought to instruct the Commissioner, N. D., and the Municipal Commissioners to submit to the public voice.

Attempted suicide by a Bráhman woman for being arrested for washing clothes in a tank at Sholápur.

43. The Kalpataru (36), in its issue of the 30th December, says:—A Bráhman woman while washing clothes in a tank at Sholápur was taken by a peon to the office (Municipal ?) where inquiry was being made in the matter when the woman escaped the attention of those present and attempted suicide by throwing herself into a well. An alarm was immediately raised and she was rescued. The woman was respectable and preferred death to being arrested and brought to an office. Writing on this incident the Poona Vaibhav (49), in its issue of the 6th January, says that the British administration of India being unsuited to the manners and customs of the people, has become unbearable to them.

PART V.—Native States.

Alleged misapplication of the funds of the Wadhwán State.

44. A correspondent of the Rájyabhakta (124), in its issue of the 8th January, says:—When Dájiráj, the late Chief of Wadhwán, died there were three lákhs of rupees in the State treasury and nearly the same was the amount of the private property of the Chief. At the close of the Joint Administratorship of Mr. Ganpatráo Lád there were in the State treasury about four lákhs of rupees. All this large amount has disappeared and the State has incurred a debt of nearly a lákh of rupees. If Kámdár Ratilál is not concerned in the misapplication of this money, he should publish an account of the money for the satisfaction of the subjects of the State. The State does not pay its creditors who are the residents of Wadhwán, and yet continues to raise new loans from the money-lenders of Bombay and other places. A tax of one rupee per household is being now levied. An enquiry ought to be made into these matters by Government.

The Nawáb of Sachin and a recommendation to increase his allowance.

45. The Káside Mumbai (112), in its issue of the 9th January, says:—The Nawáb of Sachin has been at Surat for some time past and has gained the good opinion of Messrs. Winchester, Baines, Porteous, Crawley-Boevey, Hamilton and Dárásha Dosábhái, and ought to get an addition to his reduced allowance in order to be able to keep up his high position. Implicit faith ought not to be put in the one-sided representations of Mr. Nánu Miyan, the Administrator of the State. Mr. Nánu Miyan intends to spend the reserve fund of the State in constructing a tramway line from Dumás to the Surat Station of the B. B. & C. I. Railway, but the line will be very expensive and unremunerative and ought not to be undertaken.

Expression of a hope that Mr. Howell will be confirmed in his appointment as Resident of Hyderabad.

The Pramód Sindhu (1), in its issue of the 4th January, writes:—In the early part of the year 1888, Mr. Cordery, the Resident, proceeded on six months' leave and was succeeded by Mr. A. P. Howell, once Commissioner of Berár. Subsequently Mr. Cordery resigned the service and Mr. Howell still acts for him. In Mr. Cordery, Berár lost a good Resident who knew the wants of the people and listened to their prayers. It was he who at their request prohibited the itineration of the Judicial Commissioner throughout the Province and framed the famous judicial scheme which is rumoured to have been sanctioned, but which for some unaccountable reason has not yet seen the light. Considering the long time Mr. Howell has officiated as Resident and the good he has effected during that time, we hope that he will be confirmed in the appointment to which he has done ample justice.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Part I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

His Excellency Lord Lansdowne and the Mahomedans.

1. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 17th January, says:—Though it is premature to make a definite forecast of the career of the new Viceroy Lord Lansdowne, yet from His Lordship's recent speeches one can say, without fear of contradiction, that there are signs of the career turning out, on the whole, conducive to the happiness of the subject-people. Without making any specific promises with regard to his future policy, His Lordship has evinced his statesmanship by expressing his unwillingness to make them on the ground of his insufficient acquaintance with the circumstances of the country, for, certainly, it is unstatesmanlike to make sugared speeches in the beginning and to disappoint the people in the end. In one of his public speeches at Calcutta Lord Lansdowne stated that he would treat equally all denominations of the people of India. This is indeed a definite promise, but it requires no complete knowledge of the country to make it. It is the paramount duty of every ruler, and particularly in a country like India where the people are divided into numerous castes and creeds, to be even-minded in his dealings. In reply to an address from a Mahomedan Association at Calcutta, His Lordship made a positive statement that the Government would never show special favour to the Mahomedans as a class in giving them employment in the Government service. Undoubtedly, the Mahomedans will feel much disappointed at this declaration of the Viceroy. But, properly speaking, they have no reason to feel so; for, though at present they may find it very bitter, yet like an unpalatable medicine it will do them immense good in the end. The Mahomedans are now very backward in education, and the desire of getting into the Government service will, at any rate, serve them as a stimulus to take to education. They have, therefore, reason to feel grateful to Lord Lansdowne. Those narrow-minded officers who are partial to the Mahomedans in entertaining them in the Government service are not their real benefactors, but for the sake of temporary good they spoil the people and come in the way of their education, just as over-fond parents spoil their pet children. The Mahomedans will therefore promote their own interests if they view Lord Lansdowne in the light of their real well-wisher. [The Maháráshtrá Mitrá (43) of the 10th January also puts the same interpretation on the aversion of Lord Lansdowne for premature promises, considers His Lordship to be great-minded and guileless, and advises the people to lay their grievances before His Lordship in a manner least offensive to the ruling class and least humiliating to themselves, but best befitting a loyal people. The paper finds fault with Lord Dufferin for his alleged sweet and unredeemed promises, expresses its conviction that Lord Lansdowne is a gentleman who will always be careful to fulfil his pledges, and prays that His Lordship may try to bring about the redemption of those promises of Her Imperial Majesty the Queen in the Proclamation of 1858 which have not yet been redeemed, and to remove the grievances of the people with regard to the forest oppression, the enhanced salt-duty, the costliness of education and justice, the fluctuations of land revenue and other matters which during the régime of Lord Dufferin have remained unattended to.]

2. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 13th January, writes:—It is hard to say in what spirit the Mahomedans of Bengal will take His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's declaration that Government cannot accept their claim to public employment simply because they happen to be Mahomedans, and his advice to them to take to modern literature if they wish to keep themselves abreast of the competition of modern life. To us, speaking as the truest friends of the community, the declaration is as frank as the advice is well-meant. No Government, worthy of the name, can afford to be partial in the distribution of patronage, least of all a Government like that of India. As an employer, the State lays down certain tests which must be satisfied before candidates can win their way to employment. This principle it would be dangerous to deviate from, though every facility may be offered to a backward and struggling class to bring themselves to the front for competition on equal terms with the other classes. This is the position we have always wished to be taken up, as being sound in itself, and good not only for a foreign Government, but good even for the class which may for a time feel aggrieved by its inflexibility. Better this temporary soreness, with the stimulus it gives to effort in the long run, than lifelong dependence on the illegitimate exercise of patronage. The Mahomedans are a fine race of men, and if they once rouse themselves, we believe they will surpass the Hindus, as indeed they are already beginning to do in some provinces. It would be a disservice to them to treat their youth like so many spoilt children. Wherever such cruel kindness has been shown to them, we have noticed the recipients of it lapsing into a condition of intellectual and moral mendicancy. What has been observed in the case of individuals will doubtless be observed in the case of the nation. A policy of favouritism is ruinous to the classes favoured, and subversive of the principles of good government. It is time that heads of departments recognized this truth, not only as applying to cases as between Natives and Natives, but also as between Natives and Europeans.

A suggestion to the people not to rely on the present public utterances of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne.

3. The Vengurla Vritt (65), in its issue of the 10th January, refers to the replies of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne to the Calcutta addresses, and says that although His Lordship's utterances are encouraging, the people should not much rely upon them; for, though his immediate predecessor in office, Lord Dufferin, had given perfect satisfaction to the people by his sweet utterances in Bombay immediately after his arrival there, his subsequent doings and utterances, particularly those immediately before his departure from this country, were quite the reverse of what the people had expected from him.

His Excellency Lord Lansdowne and his public speeches.

4. The Rást Goftár (83), in its issue of the 13th January, writes:—His Excellency Lord Lansdowne may not be gifted with the elocutionary powers of the eloquent Irishman who preceded him in his exalted office. But all his speeches are pre-eminently marked by sincerity, a wise reserve, and a strong common sense.

Dr. Bhándárkar congratulated.

5. The Vidya Vilás (67), the Shri Shiváji (61), and several other newspapers, congratulate Dr. Bhándárkar upon the title of C.I.E. conferred upon him by Government on the New Year's day, and observe that he fully deserves the honour.

Sir W. Wedderburn and his kindness to the people of India.

6. The Vengurla Vritt (65), in its issue of the 10th January, says that the people of India are indebted to Sir W. Wedderburn for authoritatively refuting the arguments advanced by Lord Dufferin in his famous speech against the Indian National Congress, and for acquainting the British public in time with the true state of things, and thereby giving the people of India the benefit of his knowledge of their country and their political movements.

Remarks on the intellectual part of the Indian National Congress.

7. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 14th January, writes:—We have spoken of the general success of the Allahabad Congress in its moral and educational aspects. Its intellectual part, which is by far the most important and interesting, has been no less successful. There is indeed wanting in the speeches supporting the different resolutions that fullness of information which carries conviction, but there is one predominant characteristic they possess,—we mean, moderation,—which has disarmed all opposition. The animated discussion which took place on the Arms Act question and the fate which the resolution on the land settlement question met with would suffice to show that the Congress was not a packed audience brought together to pass set resolutions without thought or demur. The modus operandi fixed upon to settle the subjects for discussion was itself of a thoroughly constitutional character and calculated to ensure that no ill-considered scheme should be brought before the Congress. A subject committee, representing all provinces and all interests, sat from day to day settling the programme of the Congress before meeting. The resolutions thus settled were open to free discussion and amendment. There was the fullest scope for deliberation, and, whatever other fault may be found with the Congress, haste and high-handedness are not among them. There is indeed room for improvement. The committee was perhaps a little too large. The speakers had not enough time to prepare themselves. There were, perhaps, too many speeches on certain subjects already too fully thrashed out. But these and other faults of procedure do not affect the essence of the movement, and, on the whole, the proceedings have throughout been marked by such moderation and good sense that they have extorted approbation from even unsympathetic critics. That the unbiassed English witnesses who were present at the Congress on purpose to see its vitality and force were, on the whole, well impressed, we have little doubt. But it is pleasing to note that persons with pronounced antipathy to the Congress have expressed approval.

The Indian National Congress and its representative character.

8. The Vidushak (66), in its issue of the 14th January, is very glad at the success of the Indian National Congress meeting held at Allahabad in spite of the strong opposition of the local Government, says that the attendance of 200 Mahomedan delegates, who were elected as such both by Mahomedans and Hindus in different places, is sufficient to prove that both these communities fully sympathize with the movement, and that the election of Presidents belonging to different creeds at the four meetings of the Congress is a fact sufficient to show that it is liked by all communities in India, and requests the people to pay more attention to the election of able delegates so as to leave no ground for the enemies of the Congress to find fault with them.

His Excellency Lord Reay's tour in the Southern Marátha Country.

9. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 13th January, writes:—The tour of His Excellency Lord Reay in the Southern Marátha Country has been a very successful one. His Excellency has been everywhere loyally received and heartily welcomed, and the people of the Southern Marátha Country will certainly have no cause any longer to envy us the privilege of being in better touch with the Governor. It was in this tour that His Excellency uttered those reassuring words which have for the time being given their quietus to the disquieting rumours regarding the fate of secondary education in this province. His Excellency received urgent requests to sanction the construction of branch railways in those parts in order to connect them with the busier portions of the presidency. But His Lordship could not hold out hopes of immediate compliance. He justly pointed out that in the matter of railways the Bombay Presidency had already done much, and urged that no further efforts in the same direction could be expected from the Government, at least for some years to come. This is a pity.

Absence of European witnesses on behalf of the prosecution in the Crawford case, and remarks thereon.

10. The Bakul (22), in its issue of the 13th January, says:—Where are the European witnesses who, it was said, were to be called to give evidence on behalf of the prosecution before the Crawford Commission? How is it that Mr. Grant, the Collector, who was to be brought as a witness for the prosecution, gave evidence on behalf of Mr. Crawford? Many European witnesses were called by the defence. Was it intended from the beginning to secure the game, if possible, at the risk of Natives? In short, there is no one who can be held responsible for the line of action taken in this case. About fifty Natives have lost their reputation and 5 lákhs of rupees have been spent! When such is our luck, why should we blame others?

Remarks in connection with the Crawford case.

11. The Dhárwár Vritt (27), in its issue of the 10th January, says:—The Crawford Commission is almost at an end, and the people have already formed their opinion as to its decision. Whatever may be the opinion of the people, it is rumoured in Poona that if Mr. Crawford comes out of the present pit unharmed he is to be thrown into another which certain persons have already commenced to dig. We do not at all believe this rumour. If Mr. Crawford is acquitted in the present case, His Excellency Lord Reay, who is most considerate and just, will never try to injure him hereafter. His Excellency was informed that Mr. Crawford had plundered the country and so he undertook the present laborious task. But now that he has heard both the sides of the story, why will he again take in hand such an intricate affair?

12. The Pratod (52), in its issue of the 14th January, says:—The Dhárwár Vritt (27) says that it is rumoured in Poona that if Mr. Crawford came out of the present pit, he will be thrown into another and that certain persons have already commenced to dig it. If this be true, we do not approve of the action of the opponents of Mr. Crawford, for, whatever may be its effect upon Mr. Crawford, the Natives are sure to suffer from it in the end. When it is likely that the present case will give rise to various charges against the Natives, it is mean to add to their difficulties by hatching further plots. The enemies of Mr. Crawford cannot do him the least harm; on the contrary, they will expose themselves to public ridicule and endanger the lives of poor Natives. They cannot do more than this. What have the enemies of Mr. Crawford done in the present case to authorize the assumption that they can do more hereafter?

13. The Vengurla Vritt (65), in its issue of the 10th January, says:—What will be the result of the Crawford case, which is the important topic of the day? From the evidence of Mr. Kalavde, a Mámlatdár, on behalf of the defence, it seems that Government officers tried their utmost to collect evidence against Mr. Crawford. It is shameful if Government officers have tried to collect evidence in the manner they are alleged to have done. It may be said that Government have shown the way to their subjects to misbehave themselves. Different conjectures are made about the result of this case by different people. Some say that the labours of the Government officers will be amply rewarded and five lákhs of rupees will be sufficient to cover the expenses if the case be decided against Mr. Crawford, but they entertain doubts as to what would happen if Mr. Crawford were totally acquitted. Will not the Government of India or the Home Government order in that case the payment of his salary for the period of suspension and of the enormous expenditure he must have incurred in defending himself? He spent sixty thousand rupees from his own pocket on the reception of His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh at the time of his visit to this country. We fear we alone shall have to suffer for the hasty action of Government and their impatient officers.

Mr. Lee-Warner's address on the responsibilities of public criticism.

14. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 17th January, writes:—The Bombay public has been, our readers are aware, very lately favoured with an able and scholarly address on the subject of public criticism by Mr. Lee-Warner, an influential member of the Bombay bureaucracy. We think we may not be far from the truth, if we take the address as representing the genuine official opinion. Our readers need not be told that the Indian mind has lately begun to show real and substantial political activity. This activity is, in its present form, such as the official world cannot afford to be indifferent to. This activity, again, is the effect of several causes, and the Native press is the principal of them. The Native press is simply an exponent of Native public opinion. Until lately Native public opinion had not the good luck to have an official recognition of its existence. But that a high official of Mr. Lee-Warner's school should now come forward to address public opinion on its powers and duties is itself an indication that with the official world the development of the Native public opinion is a proved fact. We may also add that to watch its progress has come to be regarded as an avowed official necessity. So far then there is matter for congratulation, and our thanks are due to the bureaucracy for thus encouraging us in carrying on our legitimate operations. Mr. Lee-Warner's remarks about the nature of press criticism are certainly the result of unbiassed thinking and are worthy of note. We agree with him in thinking that press criticism has self-acting restraints about itself and has a tendency to condemn itself when exceeding the bounds of reason and moderation, and that, therefore, it renders censorship superfluous. A high compliment is indeed due Mr. Lee-Warner for his candour in thus announcing an official condemnation of the Gagging Act.

15. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 14th January, writes:—An influential committee, with Mr. Justice Scott at its head, has organized a series of public lectures, primarily intended for educated Natives, but which may with no less advantage be heard by educated foreigners as well. The series was supposed to be intended as a counter-blast against the political activity which educated Natives have been of late exhibiting—a fear which gained some colour from the fact that the series was to be commenced by Mr. Lee-Warner, an administrator of pronounced imperialistic proclivities and known to be impatient of popular movements. The subject announced, "The power and responsibility of public criticism," further confirmed the popular apprehension that the lectures were intended to reprove the efforts of our people at political progress. Mr. Lee-Warner is well-known as an officer of the old má-báp school, able and energetic, and willing to do good to the people, but requiring the people to be silent and thankful and disliking the slightest attempt on their part to show any signs of life. With such antecedents Mr. Lee-Warner was generally expected to speak his mind openly on the delinquencies of the Native press and the Native public speakers. The lecture was, however, an agreeable surprise. It was a very able, scholarly and instructive address. There is an all but total absence of bitterness or invective in it, such as was expected. There are indeed not wanting indications of the lecturer's dislike of Native aspirations; but, on the whole, it is a very welcome lecture, one from which we may learn a great many lessons. The advice contained in it, whatever the spirit in which it may be given, is very salutary and deserves every consideration from us. The canons of criticism which he lays down are sound and universally applicable, and our public writers and speakers cannot do better than always bear them in mind. Another noteworthy point about Mr. Lee-Warner's lecture is that it may be taken as an expression of the highest official view in regard to the much-abused Native press and the Congress and other political movements. The expression is indeed made under the restraints which a public utterance always imposes upon a speaker. It may not represent the true views of the speaker as fully and frankly as a private conversation would indicate. But there are sufficient indications of the speaker's bent of mind, and we are glad Mr. Lee-Warner has thus opened his mind to the public. It is a great advantage to the people as well as to the Government that there should be now and then a free and frank declaration of official views, and we earnestly hope that Mr. Lee-Warner's example of taking the public into confidence will be followed by other officials of like standing. [Many other papers of the week notify their approval of the sentiments expressed by Mr. Lee-Warner on the powers and responsibilities of the press. The Káthiáwár Times (82), in its issue of the 16th January, writes:—The high ideal of criticism propounded by Mr. Lee-Warner is likely to infuse a refined spirit into public writings. This discourse should certainly be translated into the vernacular dialects for the benefit of the vernacular writers.]

The ábkári system in the Bombay Presidency and the cause of its continuance.

16. The Indian Spectator (1) of the 13th January considers the toddy question to be of great importance in a year of scarcity like the current, and says that though district authorities have unanimously opposed Mr. Pritchard's ábkári system, yet it still flourishes in the district, and that it does so because Mr. Pritchard has been supported throughout by Mr. Nugent and possibly by the whole force of the Executive Government and because few district officials care to enter upon a struggle with them. The Spectator is of opinion that the Bombay Secretariat is, in local matters, the conservative and obstructive element, and wishes that it should undergo a radical reform. It also thinks that the Secretaries should be changed from time to time, and that, if possible, their tenure of office should be made co-extensive with that of the Governors.

Government officers and their power of redressing grievances.

17. With reference to the plea of want of authority which the Collector of Poona and the Commissioner, C. D., are said to have advanced in reply to the representation made to them by the rayats of the Mával Táluka on the subject of the stringency of the forest laws, the Poona Vaibhav (49), in its issue of the 13th January, observes :—Who are the rulers of our people and to whom should they refer for redress of grievances is a mysterious question. From the village Pátil up to the Governor every officer has executive authority over the poor subjects, while there is none to listen to their grievances. We do not know what to say of this kind of administration. How will these officers like it if they be told by the rayats that they will not recognize their authority as they are not their rulers ? How will the dignity of Government be sustained if, on the ground of its officers being unauthorized to remove their inconveniences, the people refuse to respect them or to supply them with provisions and other things required by them while they are on circuit ? This want of authority is likely to lead people to believe that there is no real Government to look after their safety and happiness, and that the officers who collect money from them are no better than the plunderers who during Vásudev Balvant Phadke's disturbance collected money from the people. Government officers ought, therefore, to behave in such a manner as to satisfy the people that there is somebody to protect them.

Stringency of forest laws.

18. In an article, headed, "Forest oppression," the same newspaper says :—The fun is that in villages, as soon as cattle step out of the village limits, they are found to be in the Government reserved pastures and their owners are punished for it. Is it not really for the comfort of the subjects that a king is made ? Our present rulers are such that their subjects are put to a good deal of misery instead of deriving any happiness from them. Is not this state of things discreditable to the fair fame of the British Government ? If the Government thinks it necessary to make such oppressive laws, it is also necessary that it should point out the means whereby we may save our life. But if it cannot do so, it had better tell us to go away from this country, bag and baggage, and to vacate it for itself. Nothing can certainly be more sinful than to make an outward show that we are in the enjoyment of much happiness and pleasure, while inwardly we are pierced with iron nails. Government must remember that such open tyranny over its poor subjects is likely to stigmatise itself before the whole world. But if, instead of taking any steps in connection with this, Government sits quiet with its arms folded, we may say that it will have to repent hereafter for this kind of oppression.

Granting of permanent and general licenses under the Arms Act recommended.

19. The Dhárwár Vritt (27), in its issue of the 10th January, regrets that Government should not favourably consider the prayer of the Indian National Congress in connection with the Arms Act, and says that they should at least order their officers to issue to respectable people permanent licenses for carrying arms, and that it is not good that a fresh fee of annas 8 should be charged for the renewal of the license for each weapon every year.

Provisions purchased by revenue officials on tour.

20. The Khambát Samáchár (114), in its issue of the 18th January, says :—It is currently reported that when the Collector and his Assistants move in their respective charges, they do not pay for the provisions they purchase, or, if they do, pay so little that the dealers suffer a heavy loss, which is distributed by them among the villagers. A similar course is also followed by these officers when they happen to pass through Native States. There is little use of these officers moving in the districts, and it would be better to make them stay at the head-quarter station and do work throughout the year, permitting them at intervals only to go into the district. Government ought to institute enquiries into the above report, and, if it be substantiated, ought to do the needful to protect the people.

Rumoured abolition of one of the Subordinate Judges' Courts at Karmála and Mádha and a suggestion in the matter.

21. A correspondent of the Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 13th January, refers to the rumour that it is under contemplation either to abolish the Judicial Court at Karmála or to locate one at Kurduchiwádi instead of the present two Courts at Karmála and Mádha, and says that, considering all the circumstances, it would be better to abolish the Court at Mádha and to locate the Karmála Court at Kem and not at Kurduchiwádi.

Grievances of passengers by the coasting steamers plying between Bombay and Goa.

22. A correspondent of the Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 14th January, complains that passengers by the coasting steamers plying between Bombay and Goa find it very difficult to buy tickets at the Bombay ticket office on account of the rush of passengers, that the steamers are always overcrowded, that the localities where they are to anchor at different ports are not fixed, that the steamers do not regularly touch all ports and consequently passengers destined for one port are taken to and asked to disembark at another port to their great inconvenience and hardship, and that the number of boats employed by Messrs. Shepherd and Company to carry passengers to and from their steamers being insufficient, passengers have to engage private boats and to expose themselves to the danger of accidents like the one which recently occurred in the Revdanda harbour, and requests the district authorities to see that these complaints are duly removed.

High appointments in the Police Department and the system of filling them up.

23. The Shubh Suchak (62), in its issue of the 11th January, says:—It has been the practice in this as well as in other presidencies to appoint to the Police Department sons of European officers who cannot qualify themselves for military or medical service. They are kept as probationers for some time and even then are paid high salaries. Properly speaking, the places of Police Superintendents and their Assistants should be given to the Natives, who after serving in the posts of head and chief constables distinguish themselves as Police Inspectors. But these places are at once conferred on European lads who serve as probationers for a few months only. The present mismanagement and the inefficiency of the Police Department are due to the system of conferring these high places upon European lads, who are quite ignorant of the manners and customs of the Natives and of the duties required from their subordinates. It is good that a competitive examination has been introduced from this year, the number of European lads looking out for service in the Police Department having very much increased. We do not know whether Natives will be allowed to compete at this examination, but, if they are not, it would be sheer injustice. If Government do not allow Natives to appear for this examination, the latter should not sit quiet, but should represent their grievance to higher authorities. We are, however, of opinion that such injustice will not be done by a just Governor like His Excellency Lord Reay.

Passengers waylaid and plundered in Khándesh.

24. The Khándesh Chitraguptá (40), in its issue of the 13th January, says that wayfarers, and particularly petty dealers, passing on the road between Dhulia and Párola complain that they are much annoyed by wolves, jackals, wild pigs and other wild beasts, and are waylaid and plundered by gangs of robbers, who lie in wait between Fágne and Vichkhede, and requests Government to strengthen the police establishment on the road and to make it safe for passengers.

PART II.—Legislation.

Merchandise Marks' Bill.

25. The Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 17th January, says:—The suggestions submitted by the Bengal Chamber of Commerce in connection with the Merchandise Marks' Bill are important and ought to be adopted. It is also desirable in the interests of trade and the general public that the exact length as well as the weight of a piece of white and grey cotton goods should be marked on it, and it is to be hoped that a provision will be made in the proposed law to that effect.

His Excellency Lord Reay's speech at the Bombay University Convocation.

26. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 17th January, writes:—The speech of His Excellency Lord Reay at the Convocation on Tuesday last was edifying as well as disappointing. This being the first Convocation presided over by His Excellency, the public expected that Lord Reay would give them an exposition of the educational policy of the day. On all sides the popular mind has become unsettled on this matter, which is so vital to the best interests of the nation. The public is afraid that the exigencies of the Indian Exchequer threaten to deprive education of almost the whole of the State support which it has hitherto enjoyed. Consequently, when it was known that His Excellency was going to preside at the Convocation of this year, everybody felt relief and thought that such a distinguished educationist and enlightened ruler as Lord Reay would not allow the opportunity to slip by without giving his views on the subject. But beyond a vague assurance that the fears entertained about the fate of State education were unfounded and that the principles of the great Despatch would never be disowned, Lord Reay said nothing in particular to remove the fears of the public to an appreciable extent. But though the speech was not very re-assuring on this most important matter, it was very instructive on several points.

27. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 14th January, writes:—Our University is this time more fortunate than it was during the last three years, in that His Excellency the Governor has been pleased to find time for presiding at the Convocation which will be held to-morrow (Tuesday) evening. Lord Reay brought with him, while coming in our midst as our Governor, a high reputation as an educationist. He has done a good deal for the presidency since he took charge of the Government, and, on the whole, his administration has been marked by a genuine consideration for the welfare and progress of the people who have been entrusted to his care. The tone of morality he has imparted to the administration and the care he has taken to consult both official and non-official opinion on important questions will long be regarded as among the most creditable features of his career as Governor of this presidency. But there is a feeling in several quarters that he has not done justice to high education. The educational policy of Government has been of a halting and hesitating character, and our Arts Colleges have suffered under it. We hope that Lord Reay will allay this feeling by giving some assurances on the subject. What strikes one as surprising is that when the Government talks of high education, it says it must gradually retire from it, leaving it to private enterprise, because it must do more than it has done for primary education; while, on the other hand, the same Government is trying to transfer primary education to municipal bodies. One can hardly help inferring from this that the Government desires somehow to get rid of education partially. The inference is not altogether unwarranted.

Increase of fees in high schools and appointment of English head masters condemned.

28. The Mahrátta (2) of the 13th January and a few other newspapers of the week disapprove of the intention of the Bombay Government to make the high schools self-supporting as far as possible by raising the fees at present levied in them and to appoint an English head master at the Poona High School, and say that an increase in the present school-fees will lead to a decrease in the number of students and will necessitate further increase in the fees, and that the high schools will ultimately have to be closed for want of pupils. English head masters, they say, were once appointed, but without success, and it is a retrograde policy to try the experiment again.

The Bombay University recommended to confer honorary degrees upon certain persons.

29. Referring to the title of C.I.E. bestowed upon Dr. R. G. Bhándárkar by Government on the New Year's day, the Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 14th January, says that it looks strange that the German University should recognize the literary merits of educated men in Bombay and the local University should not even notice them. The Bombay University, after creating the honorary degree of LL.D. and conferring it on Lord Ripon at the time of his departure from India, should not stop there, but should confer honorary degrees upon old and educated men like the Honourable Ráo Sáheb V. N. Mandlik, Dr. R. G. Bhándárkar, the Honourable Mr. Dádábhái Navroji, and Ráo Sáheb Náráyan Vishnu Bápat.

The new Fellows of this year for the University of Bombay.

30. The same newspaper writes:—The list of the newly appointed Fellows of our University has been published rather late this time. On the whole, we may say that the selections have been wisely made, though there is room for the remark that the public fails to find in it the names of certain gentlemen whose educational and other qualifications deserved recognition at the hands of the University. Last year we expressed our surprise that so able and well-known a citizen as Mr. Hormasji Dádábhái had not been made a Fellow, while men who were very much his juniors had been selected for the honour. This year's list again omits him. Then again Professor Jinsivále and one or two of the Professors of the Fergusson College would have well graced the list. However, this year's selections, so far as the Native gentlemen on the list go, are, upon the whole, good. Messrs. Dayárám Gidumal, Dáji Abáji Khare and C. V. Vaidya well merited the honour that has been conferred on them. We also notice with much pleasure the name of that unassuming but learned scholar, Mr. Ardesir Frámji, in the list. We may say without being guilty of the slightest exaggeration that in honouring this last-mentioned gentleman, whose literary attainments are of a high order and who has been without any noise or fuss doing his best to promote the cause of education in general and female education in particular, the University has honoured itself.

The position of the vernaculars in the University examinations.

31. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 13th January, writes:—The Bombay Gazette announced a few days back that the committee of the Syndicate to which certain proposed changes in the Arts curriculum were submitted for consideration, has resolved to recommend that translation and composition in the vernaculars be included in the examinations subsequent to the Matriculation. This is but a partial and tardy recognition of the justice and soundness of the claims of the vernaculars. But we are thankful even for this partial recognition, and we hope that it will be but the thin end of the wedge. [Several other papers express similar sentiments.]

A suggestion to the Bombay University regarding the unfortunate candidates who have failed in the last Matriculation Examination.

32. The Shri Shiváji (61) of the 11th January strongly recommends the Bombay University to have pity for the poor candidates who have failed in the last Matriculation Examination, to hold another Matriculation Examination in April next, and to give the unfortunate candidates one more chance of passing the examination, which will cease to be recognized as qualifying for Government service from September next. It adds that a petition from the unfortunate candidates containing the above prayer will be shortly forwarded to the University, and that the latter should favourably consider it, since in doing so it will not have to incur the least expenditure, as the petitioners undertake to defray it.

Misunderstanding between the students and teachers of the Victoria Jubilee Technical Institute, Bombay.

33. The Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 14th January, says:—The teachers of the Victoria Jubilee Technical Institute, Bombay, complain that the students attending the Institute do not possess a sufficient knowledge of English to understand the lectures delivered in that language. On the other hand, the students assert that several of them have passed the Matriculation Examination and have received sufficient general education; that the statements made in the programme of studies are not attended to; that though the programme states that the Superintendent of the Institute will teach the whole day, he gives lectures on steam for only one hour in a week; that the difficult work of teaching electricity and magnetism is entrusted to a graduate of the Grant Medical College; that the work in the workshop is taught by a Madrási gentleman, who himself does not understand English well, and is unacquainted with any of the vernaculars of this presidency; and that the progress the students have made is slow. The authorities concerned ought to enquire into the matter and remove the misunderstanding existing between the students and the teachers.

PART IV.—Native States.

Alleged misdeeds of political officers in Káthiáwár.

34. A correspondent of the Nyáyadarshak (119), in its issue of the 14th January, says:—Should Government institute enquiries into the misdeeds of the Political Agency in Káthiáwár, nearly ninety per cent. of the big and small officers of that province would, it is believed, be exposed. If the persons who have connection with the Agency be interviewed, the misdeeds of European and Native officials will come to light.

Disapproval of the Government resolution prohibiting Native Princes from rewarding the services of doctors without the consent of the Political Agents.

35. The Vrittadhára (69), in its issue of the 10th January, says that although the Government resolution prohibiting Native Princes from rewarding the services of doctors who attend them during their illness without the consent of the Political Agent is good in some respects, still on principle it thoroughly disapproves of any such interference on the part of Government. Native Princes, it adds, will not in this case receive so much attention from doctors as they would otherwise have done; for, the doctors will naturally try to prolong their illness. Besides, it does not understand why Government should prevent a Native Prince from giving a handsome reward to a doctor for his services when they cannot prevent a wealthy European from doing so.

The legitimacy of the heir of the Bhávnagar Thákor questioned.

36. The Rájyabhakt (124), in its issue of the 15th January, says:—His Excellency Lord Reay's administration has ordered an enquiry into the alleged spurious heir put forward by the Thákor of Pálitána, but it is strange that no notice whatever should have been taken of the complaint frequently made that the Thákor of Bhávnagar and his Kárbhári forcibly took away a Bráhman child of poor parents and represented him as the heir of the Thákor. A report prevails that Kumár Sámatsingji has secured interest with the Government officers and that Thákor Mánsing is to be deposed for his bad conduct. The Bombay Government is said to have just commenced enquiring into the condition of the different States of Káthiáwár. Pálitána has been taken up and after it comes Bhávnagar, and the misdeeds of the Political Agency of the province are sure to be exposed.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Part I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Alleged appointment of a special officer to watch the proceedings of the Indian National Congress and remarks upon it.

1. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 20th January, writes:—The St. James' Gazette, which does not profess any love for the Indian National Congress and which very recently styled the Congresswállás "the Indian Parnellites," says that Colonel Henderson has been deputed to watch the operations of the Congress and to note the exuberance of the Native press. Bravo! What next? Colonel Henderson is said to have distinguished himself in repressing the Thugs. So his present appointment is made probably on the supposition that the Congresswállás are as bad as the Thugs. But the rumour seems to be a wild one. Probably the wish was father to the thought here. But if the rumour turns out correct, we think we need not be afraid. What is there in the inoffensive deliberations of the Congress or in the utterances of the vernacular press for the Government to be alarmed at? On the contrary, if a real watch be kept, it will show Government the true loyalty of the people and the reasonableness of the demands of the Congress. That would surely not be a bad result.

2. The Shubh Suchak (62), in its issue of the 18th January, says:—Though the reporters of the Anglo-Indian newspapers watched the proceedings of the Congress vigilantly they could find nothing wrong in it. But the Government reporter finds many defects in the Congress to the great astonishment of the public. If the Government intends to put a stop to the Congress by main force it can do so easily. But it is very lucky that Mr. Caine, M.P., Sir William Digby and several others have been eye-witnesses of the work of the Congress. [The Arunodayă (20), in its issue of the 20th January, says that it will be dangerous for Government to suppress the Congress by main force.]

Sir Auckland Colvin and the Indian National Congress.

3. The Dnyánodayă (10), in its issue of the 24th January, says that it is strange and much to be regretted that while some members of Parliament came all the way from England to India to personally witness the proceedings of the Indian National Congress with a view to form a correct opinion about the ability and loyalty of its members, the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-West Provinces, who resides in the neighbourhood of the Lowther Castle where the Congress meetings were held, should not have attended it and availed himself of the opportunity of acquainting himself with its full particulars.

Funds for the Indian National Congress and a suggestion to the people of the Khándesh District.

4. The Khándesh Chitraguptă (40), in its issue of the 20th January, requests the people of Dhulia to hold a public meeting for making arrangements to raise by public subscription Rs. 1,000 from the Khándesh District for being contributed towards the expenses of the Congress meeting which will be held either at Bombay or at Poona at the close of the current year.

Advice to the people of India never to insult the British Government.

5. The Pratod (52), in its issue of the 21st January, advises the people of India to always bear in mind the good advice of the Irish patriot, Mr. Parnell, to the people of Ireland, that they should never insult the Government with whom they are fighting for their rights, and says that although there is a similarity between the grievances of Irishmen and those of the Indians the latter have not the strength of unity which the former possess, that the people of India will get their rights as soon as the difference between them and the Irish people vanishes, that it will then be difficult for the British to rule over a country which is at a distance of 10,000 miles from their own, that the more the people of India are educated the more difficult will it be for the British to rule over them, and that the people of India should conquer the Government by the force of wisdom.

Report about the proposed abolition of the Press Commissioner's office.

6. In alluding to the report that the Press Commissioner's office will be abolished from April next, the Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 23rd January, says :—For a time after the opening of the Press Commissioner's office the Native press received a good help from the Commissioner in getting official news. Latterly the work done by this office has been very trifling and unimportant. It supplied to the press at long intervals news which it did not care to have. Properly speaking, the Press Commissioner's department ought to be reformed as it can be of much use in supplying official news to the Native press, which is in sad want of it, and it is to be hoped that His Excellency Lord Lansdowne will do so. [The Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the same date, expresses similar sentiments.]

The sentence passed on Colonel Bulkley.

7. The Din Bandhu (7), in its issue of the 20th January, says :—Considering the long service and old age of Colonel Bulkley, the punishment awarded to him appears to be somewhat severe. No doubt he showed culpable negligence in discharging his official responsibility and in making repeated demands on the regimental money, but punishment of a somewhat moderate type would have served the ends of justice just as well. [The Arunodayă (20), in its issue of the 20th January, says that if Colonel Bulkley has been charged simply with negligence the sentence passed upon him must be said to be severe, but that the president and members of the court-martial which tried him being experienced and responsible officers, there is no ground for saying that they have been either partial or inconsiderate in deciding the case.]

The rumoured decision of the Crawford Commission.

8. The Telagu Mitră (18), in its issue of the 26th January, says :—It is rumoured that the Mámlatdárs concerned in the Crawford case will alone have to suffer from the investigation of the case. The bribes received by Mr. Crawford will be said to have been received by Hanmantráo, and the Mámlatdárs will be stigmatised as bad characters. Regret will be expressed for Mr. Crawford having been put to unnecessary expense, Government will be asked to pay the whole of it, and in order to fill up the consequent gap in the treasury money will be forcibly collected from the poor rayats. Such is the rumour current.

Protest made by Justices Birdwood and Jardine against the retention of the bribe-giving Mámlatdárs in Government service.

9. In noticing the protest made by Justices Birdwood and Jardine against the retention of such Mámlatdárs as have deposed on oath that they have given bribes, the Jáme Jamshed (92), in its issue of the 23rd January, says :—The whole of the Native and European public agree with the protesting Judges. Most of the other Judges of the High Court are also of the same opinion. The arguments set forth by Justice Jardine in support of his position are irrefutable, and the Government of Bombay ought to adopt the view taken by the learned Judge. In the resolution passed upon the protest by Government it is observed that the question should not have been raised at an inconvenient time when witnesses were being examined against Mr. Crawford before the Commission. This view is not correct, but supposing it to be so, now that the Commission has dispersed there ought to be no delay in visiting the defaulting Mámlatdárs with the punishment they richly deserve. These Mámlatdárs could not have received an assurance directly from Government that they would not only not be eventually prosecuted, but would also be retained in their respective offices. If any Government officer has given them such a promise, he must have done it on his own responsibility and Government are not bound to respect the unauthorised proceeding. The public do not ask that these Mámlatdárs should be criminally prosecuted, but only require that they should not be retained any longer in Government service, and hope that Government will not fail in their duty in this matter. [The Akhbáre Sodágar (88) of the 24th January makes similar remarks.]

10. The Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 25th January, says:—The reply given by Government to the protest made by Justices Birdwood and Jardine against the retention in service of certain Mámlatdárs alleged to have purchased their offices by giving bribes, is just and in accordance with the view entertained by the public on the subject. The honourable Judges were moved to submit the protest by a desire to preserve the purity of the judicial service, but they forgot to consider the great inconvenience that would be caused by the protest while witnesses were being examined before the Crawford Commission.

The levy of land revenue by British Government and a circular order about remissions in the Konkan.

11. While writing on the subject of agriculturists and Government, the Poona Vaibhav (49) of the 20th January says:—At the beginning of the British rule in India the Government levied land revenue at the rate of one-fourth of the produce of the field, but that rate has been subsequently gradually raised and the farmer is now hardly able to maintain himself and the men who labour with him in the field after paying the Government due. Under Native Governments land revenue was levied according to the condition of the crop; but that practice was abolished under the British rule, and it is now a rule that the fixed assessment of the land revenue must be collected whether the field yields any produce or not. This oppressive rule has reduced the cultivators to a wretched condition which is beyond all description. The produce of land is dependent upon circumstances which are beyond the control of man, and Government being inexorable in its demands the cultivator is compelled to pay the Government due from resources other than the produce of his land and feels oppressed by this treatment. This year there was insufficient rain in the Konkan districts and the Government has kindly made arrangements to give a little remission to the cultivators, but they are such as the people consider to be partial; for, it is said that a circular order has been issued to the effect that remissions of land revenue should be granted only in those cases in which the cultivators have no relatives who can add to the earnings of the family from other than agricultural sources. Now is not this order unjust? Does it behove Government to look to other sources of income in collecting its land revenue? Our people believe that the British people are not plunderers but rulers, and Government should remember that if it looks solely to its own interests without caring for the subject-people, the popular belief above referred to will give way to a contrary feeling.

Distress in the Pen Táluka of the Kolába District and the necessity for affording relief to the agriculturists.

12. One Posha Sadu Pátil, an inhabitant of the village of Odhángi in the Pen Táluka, writing to the Sudhákar (63) in its issue of the 19th January, says that on account of the total failure of the rice crop this year in that part of the country, which annually supplies large quantities of rice to other districts, the people are in a very miserable condition, that the people have no money with which to buy seed for the next year, that it is a hardship to them that they should be hard-pressed for land revenue, that the District Collector who has been informed of the real state of things has not yet listened to their grievances in the matter, that they should not be dunned for land revenue until they again represent their condition to the District Collector, and that Government should kindly consider this matter and grant relief to the rayats. The editor of the paper also recommends the Collector to kindly grant relief to the people without waiting for Government orders in the matter.

Recovery of instalments of land revenue in the Broach District.

13. The Anonymous (89), in its issue of the 20th January, says:—Though there have been no crops in some parts of the Broach District this year on account of a failure of the rains, the instalments of land revenue have been called for one month earlier than usual. This is evidently an injustice to the unfortunate farmers who have lost their crops, and shows how careless the district officials are to the interests of the farmers.

Missing of some records from the Engineer's office at Sátára and the suspension of persons from Government service in connection therewith.

14. The Vritt Sudha (72), in its issue of the 22nd January, says that it is much concerned at the strange decision arrived at in the matter of the missing of some official papers from the Engineer's office at Sátára, that among the persons suspended until the missing papers should be found there are some who had not the least connection with the papers, that it is much to be regretted that in this matter which was brought to the notice of His Excellency the Governor the latter should not have considered how far the subordinates and the supervising officers were to be blamed, and that the mistake of suspending persons who had no connection with the affair should have been committed by His Excellency through oversight and on the strength of groundless assertions made by the subordinates in the department.

Recent appointments to the posts of the Curator, Government Central Book Depôt, and the Vice-Principal of the Poona Training College, disapproved.

15. The Dnyán Prakásh (11) of the 21st and the Dnyán Chakshu (9) of the 23rd January say that although they have nothing to say against Mr. Sábde personally as Vice-Principal of the Poona Training College, still they are very sorry to see that in making his appointment the Director of Public Instruction has overlooked the claims of Mr. Devkule, who is one of the ablest and old servants in the Educational Department. These newspapers add that a similar mistake has been committed by the Director of Public Instruction in filling up the post of the Curator, Government Central Book Depôt, Bombay, and that it is to be hoped that he will reconsider both these appointments.

A request to the Bombay Government to publish the names of the Native newspapers which are said to have been conducted by persons convicted of theft and similar other offences.

16. A few newspapers of the week refer to the statement in the Report on the Administration of the Bombay Presidency for the year 1887-88 that "out of the 63 newspapers started in 1885, 1886 and 1887, 24 or over 40 per cent. were edited by men either dismissed from the Government service, or convicted of theft, breach of trust and similar offences, or notorious for loose character, or of unknown social status and limited education, or by school-boys, religious mendicants and the like," and observe that the whole statement, and particularly that part of it which says that editors of some Native newspapers were men convicted of theft, breach of trust and similar offences, requires to be seriously considered by all the Native newspapers in the Bombay Presidency, that instead of making such a vague assertion Government ought to have published the names of the newspapers whose editors were convicted of the specified offences and that the sooner the newspapers in the hands of such persons are stopped by Government the better, and earnestly call upon Government to publish the names of these papers so that the respectable portion of the press may sever all connection with them.

Opinion of Government about certain Native newspapers of the Bombay Presidency confirmed.

17. The Gujarát Mitră (79), in its issue of the 20th January, concurs in the opinion recorded in the Bombay Administration Report for 1887-88 about the conductors of a large number of the vernacular newspapers started in 1885, 1886 and 1887 being persons of questionable character or limited education, and observes:—These and some of the older papers of the lower grade have by their writings brought shame on the Native press, which ought to establish a Newspaper Association composed of the older and respectable members of the press under such rules as would serve to keep up the high position of the vernacular portion of the Fourth Estate. [The Hitechchhu (80) of Ahmedabad of the 24th January expresses similar sentiments.]

Gangs of Beluchis in the Southern Konkan and the consequent alarm among the inhabitants.

18. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 20th January, writes:—Complaints from parts of Southern Konkan are rife that the presence of large gangs of Beluchi traders in villages and small towns has caused great uneasiness among the people. These gangs are said to be accompanied by the police, but the restraints exercised upon their thieving propensities are so ineffectual that poor people have often to give up their things simply to secure freedom from harm. For aught we know to the contrary, the reports may be more or less exaggerated, but it cannot be denied that these thieving traders often take the law into their own hands, and the result may easily be imagined. What we would ask Government to do in this matter is either not to allow them to travel in gangs, or to strengthen the usually weak escort of the police. When in a city like Bombay the safety of the citizen is often in danger, what amount of trepidation villagers must be in when gangs of these pseudo-traders put in their appearance amongst them, almost disarmed as they are for purposes of self-defence and not used to barbarity and rough treatment! We hope that the responsible authorities will try every means in their power to minimise the evil and to restore confidence among the people.

Advice to Hindus in the matter of cow-slaughter.

19. Referring to news from Nágpore that the Khámgaon agent of Ralli Brothers & Company having shot a cow, the Hindu cotton-dealers of that part of the country have stopped dealings with the company, the Poona Vaibhav (49), in its issue of the 20th January, thanks the dealers and assures the Hindus in other places that if they stop all intercourse with the cow-killers as the Berár dealers have done, cow-slaughter will be put a stop to at once without any other exertions on their part.

Approval of the distinction conferred on Khán Bahádur Kádirdád Khán Gul Khán, Deputy Collector, Hyderabad.

20. The Muawin-i-Majma-i-Mahammadi (162), in its issue of the 13th January, says:—It has afforded us great pleasure to learn that in the Darbár which the Commissioner in Sind held at Naushahro on the New Year's day, he recognised the valuable services rendered by Khán Bahádur Kádirdád Khán and presented him with a rifle from his Toshakhána. The Commissioner in Sind was also highly pleased to see the technical school at Kandiaro. The services rendered by the said Khán Bahádur to Government, to the subject population and to the Mahomedan cause are well known. His official superiors have also invariably spoken highly of him. We therefore hope that Government may be pleased to appreciate his services by conferring on him some substantial mark of distinction.

The Bombay police authorities praised for calling gangs of thieves to book.

21. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 20th January, writes:—We are glad that the Bombay police have at last pounced upon four gangs of thieves and got them condignly punished. This fact pretty clearly proves that the recent uneasiness and complaints on the score of want of public safety were not quite imaginary. People may or may not be timid, but the mere iteration of the epithet supported by a Government resolution on the subject can hardly be a refutation of the reality of the complaints, since the police themselves seem to recognise an increase in certain classes of crime. The ventilation of the complaints was not probably meant for the condemnation of the police, but for securing greater departmental efficiency, and we have confidence in our present worthy Police Commissioner and believe that he will stamp out the evil and make public safety doubly sure. The Bombay public, to whom, as to every one else, personal safety is of paramount importance, will be most willing to co-operate with our police in the detection of crime, but a reciprocation on their part is as much needed as readiness on the part of the people in the matter, and we have no doubt that there will be the requisite co-operation and the requisite reciprocation.

A number of thefts committed at Karáchi and the local police authorities.

22. The Sind Sudhár (164), in its issue of the 12th January, says:—Several complaints have reached us of the number of thefts committed at Karáchi. We hear that only yesterday evening, at 6-30 P.M., property worth Rs. 200 was stolen from the house of Misir Manglomæ residing in the Khushálrai street. No trace of the thieves has as yet been found. The police ought to open their eyes and keep a vigilant watch, otherwise the security of life and property will be endangered.

23. The Muin-ul-Islám (163), in its issue of the 11th January, says:—Considerable inconvenience is experienced by the people of Amri and the adjacent villages for want of a post office there. In the whole of the Mánjhand Táluka there are only two post offices, one at Mánjhand and the other at Laki. All letters addressed to the inhabitants of Amri are in the first instance received by the post office of Laki, whence they are conveyed by a rural messenger to Amri and delivered there. Besides, the rural messenger's beat extends over an area of 40 square miles. The enormous delay that thus takes place in the delivery of the post causes considerable inconvenience to the population, and more especially to the trading classes. The matter was represented to the Mukhtyárkar and to the Collector, but no steps appear to have been taken. The arrangements for the despatch of the post are still more unsatisfactory. The people are obliged to walk to the Amri railway station in the cold at night, and no letter-box being kept there, are compelled to wait until the arrival of the mail train. Besides this, the people have to go to the Laki post office, which is at a great distance from Amri, if they want to get a letter registered or to obtain a money-order. The hardship thus endured by them is indescribable. No one can understand why a sub-post-office has not been opened at Amri, seeing that it is not only a railway station, but there are in it a police thána, cattle-pound and Tapádár's dera. It is therefore to be hoped that high officers of Government will see to this and remove the hardship complained of.

PART II.—Education.

The Chancellor's speech at the recent Convocation of the Calcutta University.

24. In noticing the address of the Chancellor at the recent Convocation of the Calcutta University, the Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 22nd January, says:—The assurance conveyed by His Excellency Lord Lansdowne that Government had no intention whatever of stinting high education is gratifying, but the public is not likely to be satisfied with it in the face of past experience of similar promises not being scrupulously kept. His Excellency Lord Reay gave a similar assurance during his recent visit to Kárwár, and notwithstanding it high education is being unkindly treated. The most recent instance of this kind of treatment is afforded by the reply sent by Mr. Lee-Warner to the memorial of the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha on the subject of the proposed abolition of the Government High School at Poona, intimating that high schools will be allowed to remain only if they be able to maintain themselves. The reply seems to indicate that Government do not consider it their duty to support secondary education, and wish to get rid of the burden. This state of things is to be much regretted. If Government wish that the fears of the public on the subject should be allayed, they should change the policy recently adopted by them with regard to high education, which should be freed from the pressure to which it is subjected. It is also gratifying that Lord Lansdowne should have drawn attention to the absence of educational arrangements suited to the practical wants of the country. But particular care ought to be taken that in providing technical schools the progress of high education is not checked. [The Jáme Jamshed (108) of the same date expresses similar sentiments.]

25. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 24th January, says:—In his address at the Convocation of the Calcutta University His Excellency Lord Lansdowne distinctly said that Government would not curtail the expenditure at present incurred on education. His Excellency has given this assurance in time. People were disappointed at the absence of any declaration about the future educational policy of Government in His Excellency Lord Reay's speech at the Convocation of the Bombay University, but they will be very glad now that the point has been cleared by His Excellency the Viceroy. May this assurance be carried out and long life be given to the schools whose fate is at present uncertain!

The benefits which will accrue to India if Government withdraw from high education.

26. The Telagu Mitrá (18), in its issue of the 19th January, says:—Learned men are required to carry on the administration of a country satisfactorily, but they are quite useless for acquiring an empire, which work requires men clever in the use of the sword. In a country where foreigners have acquired supremacy it is good that the people should be ignorant, impudent and shameless rather than educated. Such men are necessarily superstitious, and though it is not probable for a large number of them to act in harmony with each other, yet they can form gangs of from 5 to 50 men each. They are adventurous and afraid of nothing in the accomplishment of their aims. If about fifty such gangs are unanimous in any matter, and act under the control of a shrewd man of their own, they will without doubt put down the supremacy of foreigners. Really speaking, India at the present moment requires such men and neither philosophers nor men of high education. In other words, the country does not at present require education which will drive away superstition, and in thinking of withdrawing from high education Government must be said to be in a sense sowing the seeds of our future well-being. There is no hope that our people will by their education restore Native rule to India, but it can authoritatively be shown that if they remain illiterate they will be able to do it. In support of this assertion may be cited the historical facts of the foundation of the Marátha Empire by Shiváji with the assistance of the ignorant people of Mával and of the overthrow of the Native rule under the régime of the three and half wise men whose fame had reached England. In brief, the practice of manly exercise, the promotion of health and the reading of military history are more beneficial to this country than the acquisition of liberal education. We therefore request that Government will be kind enough to carry out their intention of discouraging high education and will open gymnasia in place of the present high schools. If, however, Government do not carry out their proposal, our people should not be backward in the acquisition of knowledge, for, it has its own benefits.

Educational policy of the Bombay Government.

27. The Indu Prákash (12), in its issue of the 21st January, writes:—Mr. Lee-Warner's letter to Mr. Chatfield explaining the new policy of Government in regard to education is at once a relief and a disappointment. It relieves the anxiety that our high schools were doomed to immediate extinction; but it raises a further anxiety that the measure contemplated by Government may result in a like fate before long. Government now pledges its word that high schools will not be abolished, and thus the Poona High School which was generally supposed to be beyond rescue is saved. The Ahmednagar High School too, we take it, remains a Government institution. Thus far the reversal of the contemplated policy is a graceful deference to public opinion. But the condition with which the restoration is clogged almost annihilates the goodness of the act. The condition proposed is that the fees should be raised all round so as to make the schools self-supporting. Government is not unconscious of the fact that the raising of fees may lead to a falling off in attendance, and that the increased fees will press heavily upon a large class of people. To relieve this pressure it is proposed to allow in each school a certain number of free and reduced-fee studentships, to be distributed according to the old rules and on a general examination. We are thankful that the high schools have been saved from extinction, but we fear the condition imposed upon their continued existence will subject them to slow death. The fees at present levied in the mofussil schools are heavy enough and in many cases prohibitive. We know for a fact that many a poor and middle-class boy has to give up his school course, and the cost of education is a severe burden on many a family. To enhance the cost further means an absolute denial of education to many a student. There are many families who are too poor to pay such enhanced fees and too proud to beg or to sue for free-studentships. The only resource is a large growth of private schools, but these too, unless they choose to be independent of Government aid, will have to conform to Government rates of fees. We are surprised that in spite of all remonstrance Government is determined to make itself rich at the expense of the education of the people. But what will Government gain after all by this short-sighted parsimony? We doubt if Government will be very much better than it now is. In a country where free education at the house of the teacher is the time-honoured tradition, any imposition of fees must be felt burdensome, but perhaps it is now too late to complain of that. It is one of the onerous bequests of the Education Commission, and it is a misfortune of this presidency that a member of the Commission who has made high fees one of his favourite crotchets controls the destinies of the Education Department at this time. But surely there is a limit to the riding of hobbies and to the niggardliness of Government.

28. The Pratod (52), in its issue of the 21st January, refers to the letter from the Secretary to Government in the Educational Department to the Director of Public Instruction, and remarks:—From this letter our readers will clearly see how Government have withdrawn themselves from the work of public instruction. Nobody needs to be told that when the policy embodied in the letter in question is carried out, how difficult it will be for people to get either primary or secondary education. Although we cannot foretell the result of this new policy, it is certain that as long as people are receiving education there is no fear of any excitement among them; but when darkness overshadows them, we are afraid their loyalty might be shaken. If Government knowingly issue such fearful resolutions, we think they are tired of our loyalty.

29. The Kalpataru (36), in its issue of the 20th January, is surprised to see Government curtailing the expenditure of the Educational Department instead of abolishing any other department, because, it says, the latter course would throw some of their own people out of employment, and remarks:—Government have abandoned their intention of abolishing the high schools and published their proposal for increasing the school-fees. Will anybody say that they will encourage education by doing so and introducing new examinations like the University School Final Examination? Comparing the percentage of the total revenue that is spent on education in this country with that spent in other countries, the former is found to be very low. What a blunder it is that Government should curtail the already very small amount of money spent on education! What sort of policy is it to say on one hand that it is ridiculous to concede the privilege of sending representatives to the Legislative Councils to the people of India when only 5 or 6 per cent. of them know their vernacular language and hardly one per cent. know the English language, and, on the other, to deal a blow to education? It is a mistake to be now afraid of the results of education, for they were already foreseen when the policy was first inaugurated in this country.

30. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 20th January, writes:—This being the first time His Excellency Lord Reay was to preside at the Convocation as Chancellor of the Bombay University, the public, especially the Native portion of it, looked forward with much interest to His Excellency's pronouncement of the policy of Government with regard to education. In this expectation those who were most curious were most disappointed. His Excellency dwelt at length on other topics but this. It has been urged that his reticence was due to the fact that Lord Reay addressed the Convocation as Chancellor, and not as Governor of Bombay. So far the explanation is reasonable enough. But if there was one occasion more than another on which the rapid change which is taking place in the policy of Government could have been explained, it was when His Excellency was taking the public into his confidence in matters vitally affecting the interests of education. We may attribute His Excellency's silence, we think, to the fact that Lord Reay does not share the views of the Supreme Government as to the expediency of the new policy, but is forced to carry it out under the inexorable demands of that Government. Is it not curious that whereas the question which vitally interests the middle classes in England at the present day is how best to make education free, the anxiety which troubles the mind of the Government of India is how to make it dear and dearer to a prohibitive point? The benefits of high education are put forth with all the eloquence which the theme admits of, while the sources from which high education draws its vitality are being dried up, if not cut off.

31. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 20th January, says:—We cannot too highly praise the Convocation speech of His Excellency Lord Reay. It contains much information and is full of wholesome advice for students and Native Princes. We think that His Excellency's speech is worth considering by every sensible person. Looking to the able manner in which all the subjects touched upon therein are discussed, everyone will admit that the speech is the best of its kind. His Lordship's silence about the educational policy of Government has given rise to the fear that the Educational Department is sure to meet with some danger, and has disappointed the people. We request His Excellency the Governor to fight with the Supreme Government in the interests of the Educational Department in order to make it quite safe, and to encourage the people by removing the cause of their disappointment.

32. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 20th January, writes:—If His Excellency Lord Reay's Convocation speech was studiously silent on almost all the practical questions of the day, it was singularly eloquent and instructive on the subject of the duties and the ideal of a real University. It has been a fashion hitherto to address the Convocation speech to the new graduates solely, exhorting them to make the best of their education by finding out new outlets for their energies, and so on. But Lord Reay rises higher, and with all the authority of a distinguished educationist, higher even than his high office, lays before the members of the University the high ideal which they should constantly place before their eyes in discharging their duties. It is this part of the speech that is most valuable—one that deserves to be constantly read and studied by all interested in the cause of education in this presidency. The question has indeed been discussed in the press, but never before was the ideal so authoritatively placed before the Fellows, at least never with so much force and fullness. Lord Reay has done a very valuable and eminent service to the cause of education in drawing the attention of the members of the Senate to what is expected from them. To despise such an ideal and to look to the present issues alone has of late come to be regarded as an evidence of the business capacity of an individual, and His Excellency's advice, therefore, did not come too soon to dispel such false notions. We say that Lord Reay would have, however, laid us under infinite obligations if he could have along with the ideal, given us some insight into how it was to be realised. The silence of the Chancellor on this point of ways and means is a weak point in his speech. Sir Richard Temple once remarked in his Convocation speech, that while addressing them as a Chancellor he could not divest himself of his capacity as the Governor of the presidency, and we believe the same might be said of Lord Reay. It is admittedly one of the principal duties of a civilized Government to find out means to place education on a sound basis. But if we look to Lord Reay's speech, we regret to find that sufficient stress has not been laid on this point.

33. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 21st January, writes:—The address which His Excellency Lord Reay delivered at the last Convocation of the Bombay University fully confirms the reputation as an educationist which His Lordship brought with him from Europe. The address is all that an academic address ought to be. It is highly learned and suggestive, and shows a comprehensive grasp of the larger educational questions. It portrays an ideal of a University which is very high indeed to reach, but which those concerned in the progress of our University would do well always to keep before their mind's eye. The speech is indeed disappointing in one respect. Coming after so many years of expectation and disappointment, and at a time when the air is thick with rumours of a variety of changes in the educational administration, it was generally expected that the speech would be an occasion for some declaration of Government policy in regard to education. As we observed last week, here was an opportunity for the Government to set itself right in public opinion. Government cannot be unaware that there is considerable uneasiness abroad in regard to the intentions of Government about education. A word or two from the Governor's lips in regard to these intentions would have set at rest, all uneasiness. It is idle to contend, as some apologists of Government have contended, that Lord Reay spoke at the University as Chancellor and not as Governor of Bombay. The two functions can hardly be separated in the public mind. In fact His Lordship is Chancellor because he is Governor. It was a rare opportunity for His Excellency to take the public into his confidence and allay their fears. Barring this omission, however, the address is an excellent exposition of many academic topics, and deserves the most careful study from all persons interested in education.

34. The Gujaráti (78), in its issue of the 20th January, writes:—The learned Chancellor of the University has delivered an address which is remarkable, both for the variety of subjects it dwells upon in a strikingly independent manner and also for its suggestive thoughtfulness. We are, however, sorry that Lord Reay will not be among us for a long time to carry out the programme which he has conceived with admirable insight into the needs of modern civilization, and it becomes a serious and important question for the people of this presidency to consider the desirability of petitioning Her Imperial Majesty the Queen to prolong his term of office, which has already been characterised by enlightened considerations of broad statesmanship. Next to Lord Ripon, Lord Reay has fully exhibited within the limited sphere of his duties that constructive genius which in a wider sphere for its exercise and under more favourable conditions of Indian finance would have laid the people under deep and permanent obligations. It would be infinitely better that the educationist and statesman who conceives an excellent programme should be himself entrusted with the carrying out of his ideal, at least in its initial stages, than that its execution should be undertaken by his successor who can hardly feel the same parental affection and enthusiasm for the development of the tender offspring of his predecessor. Besides, it is not every Governor or Chancellor who can be an architect of kindly and genuine sympathies for the rising generation. Broad and genuine sympathy, coupled with constructive genius, not the sympathy of a calculating diplomat, is a very rare commodity in this world, and those who are fortunate enough to obtain it for nothing fail grievously in the duties they owe to themselves, if they do not try to prolong the use and enjoyment of their very valuable possession.

35. In a contributed article the Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 20th January, writes:—Perhaps the best portion of His Lordship's address is the one that has reference to the ideal which our local University should constantly strive at. Though the ideal is excellent and must be accepted in the abstract by every sound educationist, we fear it will be impracticable for many a year to come. It is a pity that His Lordship's practical good sense wandered here in the paths of ideal excellence. The standard of the Amsterdam University held out before the local Senate is indeed an ennobling one; but it is most impracticable so far as an Indian University is concerned. The economic condition of the country must undergo an immense revolution before any attempt can be rationally made to follow in the wake of that unique University. Is it not a pity that Lord Reay should gravely propose to the local Senate to imitate the example of the Amsterdam University? Did His Lordship mean to throw the burden of high education from the provincial shoulders to the shoulders of the citizens? That would mean something like "bleeding to death." The proposal was neither statesmanlike nor practical, and we are sorry His Lordship felt constrained to suggest it, eminently utilitarian as he is in his ideas on education in general. Perhaps His Lordship was carried away by the grand and glowing picture of an ideal University he portrayed for the edification of his audience. But apart from these defects, it may be observed that the Convocation address is brimful of facts and suggestions which should be well studied by those interested in high education. We trust, in conclusion, that His Lordship will in his next attempt repair the mistake and supply the omission made in this year's Convocation address. [The Rást Goftár (83), in its issue of the 20th January, observes that not a single thoughtful individual who has reflected on the present condition of education in India could endorse His Excellency Lord Reay's ideal as a practical one or even remotely realisable.]

The Bombay University and its funds from various sections of the community.

36. The Subodh Patrika (16), in its issue of the 20th January, writes:—The passion of the hour seems so strongly to run in the direction of sectional charity that one wonders where it is all to end. For many years after the establishment of the local University, not a single endowment was to be found in its books which was not open to all classes of the community alike. Subsequently, however, it was discovered that one or two classes of young men stood more in need of pecuniary encouragement than others. This afforded a ready passage for the restrictive principle to enter. And now it has so much fallen in with the class spirit which is so dominant among us all, that there is some danger of the University being at no distant date called upon to administer as many tiny caste funds as there are sections and sub-sections of the Native community to be found in any part of the presidency. Is it not time for the University to consider if such work is perfectly consonant with its aims and ideals?

Dr. Banks being made a Fellow of the Bombay University disapproved.

37. The Hitechchhu (80) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 24th January, after expressing dissatisfaction at the list of new Fellows of the Bombay University, says:—We are surprised to find in this list the name of Dr. Banks who tied to the trees certain villagers after stripping them of their clothes. Government were merciful to him and did not send him back to the Military Department; but it is very improper to consider the person who oppressed the subjects eligible for the honour of a University Fellowship.

Approval of the appointment of Ráo Bahádur Venkatráo Trimalráo as a Fellow of the Bombay University.

38. The Kannadá Suvárte (141), in its issue of the 18th January, says:—We are gratified to see the name of Ráo Bahádur Venkatráo Trimalráo, B.A., LL.B., in the list of the Fellows of the Bombay University this year. It is desirable to have a large number of Kánarese-knowing men in the University in order that the condition of that language may be improved.

Certain school-boys in Sind flogged for calling British Government despotic.

39. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 19th January, states that in a certain Government school in Sind boys were flogged for styling, in the course of an essay, the British Indian Government despotic, and says that the punishment was barbarous and out of all proportion to the gravity of the offence, and that if the boys had the slightest doubt that the English Government is despotic, they, and, for the matter of that, we ourselves have not the slightest doubt that the management of schools in this country is extremely despotic.

The young Prince of Nándod dismissed from the Rájkumár College.

40. The Rájyabhakt (124), in its issue of the 22nd January, says:—A correspondent from Rájkot writes that depending on the representations of a back-biter, Mr. Macnaughten, the Principal of the Rájkumar College, has dismissed from the College Kirátsinh, the young Prince of Nándod, and a misunderstanding in connection with this matter having arisen between Mr. Macnaughten and Mr. Tarkhad, the latter has applied for his transfer to some other place. Mr. Macnaughten ought not to be so credulous, and should have enquired into the matter. Government will now do well to enquire into the subject.

PART III.—Railways.

Treatment of first class Native passengers on the G. I. P. Railway.

41. Mr. B. S. Wádia, a "first class traveller," writing from Jabalpur to the Kaiser-i-Hind (111), says in its issue of the 20th January:—On the 24th December last, some Hindu gentlemen took a first class reserved compartment in the Jabalpur mail train that was about to leave Bombay, and took their seats in it with their luggage. In the meantime a haughty European gentleman came into the compartment and insulted them by throwing out their luggage. They appealed to the European station master, but were scolded by the latter, who seemed to be afraid to remonstrate with the European gentleman.

Part IV.—Municipalities.

Degeneration of the educated youths in India and want of activity in the Poona municipal elections.

42. The Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 24th January, says that on account of the system of holding frequent examinations and of the custom of early marriages the educated Natives have lost all strength, perseverance, ambition and other manly qualities that are to be found in the youths of other countries; and referring to the activity shown by the people in England at the time of Parliamentary elections, exhorts the candidates for commissionerships in the Poona Municipality to manifest some activity of that sort and to show that they are fit to enjoy the important privilege of local self-government given to them.

Part V.—Native States.

Provisions purchased by the officers of the Pálanpur Political Superintendentship while moving in the district.

43. A correspondent of the Hitechchhu (80) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 24th January, says:—While the Political Superintendent of Pálanpur and his Assistant, with their large establishments and followers, the Thánedár, Faujdár, Japtidár, Kárbhári and other officials go on circuit in the Agency limits, they purchase provisions and labour which do not appear to be paid for, and the dealers, suppliers and labourers have to bear the loss. The Superintendent and his Assistant may be taking receipts for payments made by them for provisions personally required, but no such arrangement seems to have been made in regard to their large establishments.

Necessity for fixing the date 1st of May for the beginning of the May vacation in Berár instead of the 15th, and some reasons for doing so.

1. The Pramod Sindhu (1), in its issue of the 18th January, writes:—The near approach of the hot weather suggests a few remarks on the subject of the May vacation. The vacation in Berár commences on the 15th of May, a very inconvenient date for obvious reasons. Besides there are other considerations which deserve the serious attention of Government, and it is hoped that the subject will not be lost sight of this year. The Beráris labour under two disadvantages in this respect, viz., (1) short period of vacation and (2) inconvenient fixing of the date. As regards the first it is not understood why a concession granted in Bombay, where civil work is far heavier, cannot be extended to Berár. But if the local administration considers it necessary to restrict the vacation to only one month, endeavours ought at least to be made so to fix the date as to allow the whole period being enjoyed. To this end we would strongly advocate the fixing of the date of commencement of the vacation to 1st May. This will give rest to those concerned during the hottest period of the hot season, and will prove acceptable to all in every way.

The public prosecutors for Berár and suggestion to the Judicial Commissioner to appoint one of the old members of the bar instead of Mr. Leach, the proposed candidate.

2. The Varhád Samáchár (3), in its issue of the 21st January, writes:—Whatever be the efficiency of the police authorities in detecting crime, they can never be expected to conduct criminal cases before magistrates as efficiently as lawyers. In the absence of persons appointed to prosecute on behalf of Government, the Police Superintendent or his assistant has to be appointed to conduct cases,—nay, sometimes subordinate magistrates have to leave their magisterial functions to be confronted with counsel for the accused. In many cases it is well-known that justice suffers on this account. It would undoubtedly be a great help to the police to put their case before the magistrate exactly as it is necessary to do so. In the sister presidencies there are public prosecutors, and the office, though it existed in Berár once, exists no longer. Under the new judicial scheme it would be necessary to have the office revived, and indeed we hear that something of the sort is already in contemplation for the Amráoti District, and we have also heard that Mr. Leach, a gentleman who practised at Hyderabad and who has lately come to Amráoti to practise there, is to be selected for the post to be newly created. It seems rather curious that the revival of the office is coeval with the coming of Mr. Leach. But we could never persuade ourselves to believe that the office would be given to Mr. Leach. A retainer of a hundred or two, besides fees in cases, is the least consideration in the matter of appointing a gentleman like Mr. Leach. The office is looked upon more as a recognition of merit and people covet it more for honour than for its perquisites. The members of the local bar ought to be preferred, and we have no doubt that if the office is created our present Judicial Commissioner will not fail to make a judicious selection. We have reason to be proud of the bar at Amráoti and there are many worthy members of it who would consider it an honour to be appointed to the office of public prosecutor. In point of merit or in point of length of time for which they are practising, there are many members of the bar whose claims to the office would decidedly be better than those of Mr. Leach. Of course it lies with Government to make the appointment, and the higher authorities will naturally be guided by the recommendations of the Judicial Commissioner. We fully trust that the selection will be satisfactory and that we may have no occasion to make any unpleasant remarks on the subject. With Colonel Mackenzie at the head of the Judicial Department, we are not at all apprehensive about a proper selection for the office, if one is going to be made.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Part I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Political inactivity of the people of India and a suggestion to the leaders of Native society in the matter.

1. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 28th January, expresses surprise that the people of India, in spite of their intellectual, commercial and industrial progress, should have tamely and patiently put up for many centuries past with a condition of humiliating and painful subjection and dependence, without ever making any attempts to show their patriotism, courage and self-respect by political agitation, attributes this inactivity and spirit of forbearance to their tendencies being in the direction of spiritual elevation rather than in that of secular aggrandizement and to their firm belief that a king is made by God and that man has no more to do with his prerogative and its exercise than with the movements of heavenly bodies, and, with a view to remove this belief, which it considers to have been highly detrimental to the interests of the country and to have reduced the people almost to the condition of beasts, proposes that by means of newspapers and public lectures the leaders of Native society should impart political education to the people at large and acquaint them with their own rights and those of the king, without resorting to any unconstitutional or disloyal measures, and without being in a hurry about the political emancipation of the country, but by slowly and steadily impressing upon their minds the usefulness of and the necessity for an institution like that of the British Parliament in India.

Sir Lepel Griffin's letter to the London Times questioning the representative character of Mr. Dádábhái Navroji.

2. With reference to the letter of Sir Lepel Griffin to the London Times, in which he says that being a Pársi Mr. Dádábhái Navroji is in no way a representative of the people of India, the Hindu Punch (31), in its issue of the 31st January, remarks that there is no person who is better qualified than Mr. Dádábhái Navroji to be a representative of the people of India, whether Hindus, Pársis, Mahomedans, Jews, or Christians, and that the people of India would have been ashamed to consider Mr. Dádábhái their representative if he had been a shameless, loose-tongued, selfish, quarrelsome and pestilent fellow like Sir Lepel Griffin, and requests all public bodies to give a sharp reply to Sir Lepel, who has proved ungrateful to the country from the treasury of which he will receive his pension in England.

Presents to retired Government officers and the resolution of the Secretary of State for India in the matter.

3. The Pratod (52), in its issue of the 28th January, highly approves of the resolution of Viscount Cross, Secretary of State for India, in the matter of the acceptance of presents from Natives by retired Government officers, and observes that it was this very gentleman who about three years ago passed a judicious resolution in the case of the Honourable Mr. Sullivan, then a member of the Madras Executive Council.

His Excellency the Marquis of Dufferin's administration of India.

4. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 26th January, writes;—The policy of Lord Lytton was simply to secure the safety of the empire and that of Lord Ripon was solely to effect the advancement of the people, while that of Lord Dufferin had in view the combination of the extreme and opposed policies of his two predecessors in office. Lord Dufferin was neither a Conservative nor a Liberal, but a Unionist. His principle was the advancement of the people in consonance with imperial integrity and supremacy. His acts and measures may be here and there unwise or inopportune, but the principle which he followed is the soundest and most salutary to the interests of India. The importance and beneficence of this principle are but scantily recognized now, as it has not yet fructified, but we hope that it will do so under the genial influence of his worthy successor.

Desirability of Poona being made the capital of India in preference to Delhi.

5. Referring to a proposal for making Delhi the capital of India, the Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 31st January, advances the claims of Poona, observing that it is, by reason of its uniform temperature, historical importance and geographical position, better fitted to be the seat of government than Delhi.

Approval of the proposal to institute an enquiry into the police administration of India.

6. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 27th January, writes:—We thank the Government of India sincerely for their proposal to institute an inquiry into the police administration of the country. After the frank avowal of Lord Dufferin that the police was not as efficient as it should be, it was indispensable to cause an inquiry to be made. We recently noticed how the Government of this presidency spoke of the efficiency of their police, and the same cry is heard everywhere. The higher appointments in the police service are held by Europeans, who have neither had a special training nor can lay claim to any natural aptitude for police duties. Moreover, they labour under the disadvantage of being ignorant of Native habits and manners. Yet the Government seem to place the utmost reliance upon them and lay the blame of the failure to detect crime on the shoulders of the poor under-fed sepoy. But this is the way in which such affairs are managed.

In India social progress need not precede political advancement.

7. The Anonymous (89), in its issue of the 27th January, observes:—There is not much sense in the assertion that in India social progress should precede political advancement, because everyone must admit that though England has made great advance in politics, its social condition is very low. India is in need of social advancement, but she does not suffer from such immoralities and horrible occurrences as England is pestered with. The social condition of India is far superior to that of England and needs no interference from her.

The present Anglo-Indian officers and their administration of India.

8. In a communicated article, headed, "The difference between the past and the present," the Dnyán Ságar (28) of the 28th January expresses its opinion that the present Anglo-Indian officers attach much less importance to the natives of India than their predecessors in office did in former times, that they are not restrained in their wanton behaviour by Government as their predecessors in office were, and that the present administration being conducted by weak laws there is no saying how many officers like Mr. Arthur Crawford and Sir Lepel Griffin are making a havoc in India, and accounts for this state of things, which it calls a kind of anarchy, by saying that there is no one responsible for the government of India, the Queen-Empress being but dependent upon Parliament, which again frequently changes and is apathetic in Indian matters.

Officials in the Political Department.

9. The Anonymous (89), in its issue of the 27th January, says:—The Government of India have recently published rules prohibiting Government officials from incurring debts and accepting addresses. Do the officials act according to them? Government are aware that like Mr. Crawford there are many Indian officials who are extravagant and involved in debt. It is not right to question their honesty, but from the Crawford case it may be inferred that such persons may be committing mischief. In the Political Department officials do not accept addresses, but enjoy the exercise of great authority. The Native Princes humble themselves before men who are of low intellect and belong to the lower class of Englishmen, on account of the high authority exercised by them. In short, now-a-days carriages, gardens and women are the three means of pleasing officials. The intentions of Government are most praiseworthy, but the officials fill their pockets and use other people's carriages and gardens. As for women, the evil has grown very general.

10. The same newspaper says:—A very large number of the Indian officials are adulterous, but their misconduct is not exposed because they hold high authority. Numerous cases like that of Mr. Wilson can be found on the Government records. Government ought to duly consider the fact that now-a-days adultery is on the increase among the officials, and that the subject-people entertain a very low opinion of them for that reason. The low Europeans form connections with Koli, Bhil and Dhed women when they cannot get women belonging to the higher classes. Such conduct being against the rules of morality, the Government of India ought to duly consider the matter and convey a warning to the officials.

11. Referring to the judgment of the Bombay High Court in the matter of the rule nisi issued against Messrs. Dabir, Sindekar, and others, the Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 31st January, writes:—Mr. Vidal thought, for the reasons stated by him, that he was exercising a wise discretion in dismissing the complaint presented by Ganesh Náráyan Sáthe, and now a full bench of the Bombay High Court tell him that he did not do so in treating the complaint in this manner, and that in doing so "he allowed himself to be influenced by considerations altogether apart from the facts which were adduced by the complainant in support of the charge," and that "he proceeded exclusively on what he presumed, from the surrounding circumstances, to be the motive by which the complainant was actuated in moving in the matter." Possibly Mr. Vidal relied too much on his "presumed" knowledge and considerations, and possibly Ganesh Náráyan Sáthe, or the person or persons at whose instigation he is alleged to have acted, may not have been actuated by the motive suggested in Mr. Vidal's reply to the reference from the High Court. It may have been from the purest motives, no other than those by which "a friend of equity and even-handed justice" would be actuated, that Ganesh Náráyan Sáthe took the course he did. But we are inclined to think that the real question at issue should have been, not the motive which the complainant may have had in instituting criminal proceedings against Sindekar, Dabir and others, but the effect that would have resulted, or was likely to result, from such a course on the minds of the witnesses for the prosecution before the Crawford Commission, if the District Magistrate had then proceeded with Sáthe's complaint according to law. Whatever the legal aspect of the question,—and we have now got it authoritatively,—it is not only highly probable, but almost certain, that if, instead of summarily dismissing Sáthe's complaint under Section 203 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, Mr. Vidal had at that time entertained it and proceeded to deal with it according to law, the prosecution would have been seriously hampered in their case before the Crawford Commission by the effect such action on the part of the District Magistrate would have had on their witnesses,—we mean, the leading witnesses in each article of charge under the first head. Even as it was, we are not quite sure if the subsequent action on the part of Justices Birdwood and Jardine in issuing notices to Sindekar, Dabir and others to show cause why the District Magistrate's order should not be set aside, did not produce some effect on some of the leading witnesses examined before that Commission subsequent to the issuing of the said notices. Having regard to all these circumstances we are inclined to think that Mr. Vidal's action furthered the interests of justice, so far as the inquiry before the Crawford Commission was concerned, by leaving unhampered the witnesses on whom the prosecution absolutely relied. We are further inclined to think that the defence also must have felt extremely thankful to Mr. Vidal for the step he took, no doubt under a misapprehension as to the nature of the discretion he was invested with under the Code of Criminal Procedure; for, if he had then acted otherwise, and the leading witnesses for the prosecution had been deterred from openly stating—we shall not call it the truth, as it has yet to be proved to be such—what they did, the defence also would have been considerably, nay more materially, hampered in securing their object, viz., the demonstration of the innocence of Mr. Arthur Crawford regarding the more serious articles of charge preferred against him by the Bombay Government. So far then, and no more, we are inclined to think that Mr. Vidal's action furthered the interests of justice by leaving unhampered both the parties. But there is yet one circumstance which clearly shows to our mind that it is not yet time to proceed against the persons complained against by Ganesh Náráyan Sáthe; for, we hold that until the guilt or innocence of Mr. Arthur Crawford is determined by the verdict of the Commission, it is not at all possible to say what offence, if any, "this band of volunteers" (that is, the several Mámlatdárs and others who are alleged to have voluntarily confessed to their having paid bribes to Mr. Arthur Crawford personally, or through Hanmantráo, or through Kázi Abbás) has committed. And we further hold that any alternative verdict, like that given by Mr. Vidal in the Hanmantráo case, can never be satisfactory; for, although Hanmantráo has been judicially convicted, his guilt or innocence seems to us to be still an open question. Let us suppose that Mr. Arthur Crawford is honourably acquitted by the Commission on the charge of corruption, including of course the Sindekar and Dabir cases; what then becomes of Hanmantráo's conviction by the District Magistrate? It would be necessary in such a case, we should think, to quash both the conviction and sentence; for, we cannot see how if Mr. Arthur Crawford's innocence is held to have been proved, and he is also further proved to have been very regular in his appointments, promotions and transfers, Hanmantráo can be said to be guilty under any of the two sections of the Penal Code under which he was charged. And if Hanmantráo be not guilty, how can these Mámlatdárs and others be guilty as abettors of, or accessories to, the offence either under Section 162 or Section 163? Should the verdict of the Crawford Commission, however, be otherwise,—and what that verdict will be it is impossible to say,—then it will be readily admitted that the same reasons which led Mr. Vidal to award the maximum penalty to Hanmantráo under the alternative section, will probably lead the appellate court to uphold his conviction and to enhance his sentence to the other maximum under Section 161 or Section 162. Mr. Vidal in the concluding paragraph of his judgment wrote:—"Offences such as those of which Hanmantráo has been proved guilty are like plague-spots on the public administration, and the evil which arises from them is widespread and incalculable. When detected, they need to be punished with exemplary severity. I feel, therefore, that I should fail grievously in my duty were I to suffer any considerations which might be urged in mitigation of Hanmantráo's crime to deter me from passing the maximum sentence of imprisonment and fine which it is competent to me to inflict in respect of each head of the charge." We fully endorse the sentiments expressed in the foregoing extract from Mr. Vidal's judgment, and we say for our part that we too should grievously fail in our duty were we to suffer any considerations whatever to deter us from advocating that Hanmantráo and these Mámlatdárs, who would then be proved to have been privy to the alleged system of widespread corruption and to have taken an active part therein, should be shown any indulgence whatever. They should be punished with exemplary severity, but only when the exact nature and the degree of the offence they may have committed is ascertained beyond all doubt. This, we say, cannot be ascertained until the result of the enquiry before the Crawford Commission is finally known.

Remarks in connection with the judgment of the Bombay High Court in the matter of the rule nisi issued against Messrs. Sindekar, Dabir and others.

Retention of the Mámlatdárs who deposed in the Crawford case to having purchased their offices by giving bribes, disapproved of.

12. In noticing the London telegram that the Times has condemned the retention of the Mámlatdárs who have confessed in the Crawford case the payment of bribes for the purchase of their offices, the Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 1st February, says:—It is lowering British prestige to allow these Mámlatdárs to remain in office. They are quite unfit for the magisterial chair, their proper place being the dock in a criminal court. Government may have given them assurance of protection from criminal prosecution, but they ought not to be allowed to retain their offices. Government were right for certain reasons in being unwilling to move in the matter while the Crawford case was being heard before the Commission; but now that the Commission has finished its work, the bribe-giving Magistrates ought to be at once dismissed from the service. A single caste has monopolised the Mámlatdárs' line in the Deccan.

An enquiry ought to be made on the subject and deserving men of other castes should be admitted into this branch of the revenue service. [The Akhbáre Sodágar (88) and the Samsher Bahádur (126), in their issues of the same date, and the Kaiser-i-Hind (111) of the 27th January express similar sentiments.]

Protest of Justices Jardine and Birdwood against the retention in Government service of the self-condemned Mámlatdárs supported.

13. The Sind Times (5), in its issue of the 26th January, publishes the correspondence between Mr. Justice Jardine of the Bombay High Court and the local Government on the subject of the witnesses who admitted corrupt conduct in the Hanmantráo and Crawford cases retaining offices under Government, and says:—It seems to us that the reasoning of the Judges is conclusive in justifying their action. It might have been "inconvenient" certainly to the Governor to find the course taken by his Government condemned by the Judges of the High Court, but the public will assuredly be of opinion that they have only done an obvious duty. They have done well in protecting as far as they could the interests of the State, in endeavouring to keep the judicial administration of the country, their special charge, free from corruption. The retention of judicial officers, guilty by their own confession of corrupt practices, would certainly tend not only to bring the administration into disrepute, but to pollute the sources of justice, and the resolution of the Government of Bombay under review appears to afford only an additional proof of the complete want of sagacity and prudence which has distinguished its course throughout the proceedings.

The position taken by Government in regard to Messrs. Dabir, Sindekar and others approved of.

14. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 27th January, says:—With regard to the interesting side issue, as to whether some of the witnesses in the case who have compromised themselves as judicial officers of the Government, should be allowed any longer to remain in the same position, we are constrained to observe, after much anxious thought, that although any one or more of the Judges of the High Court, especially on the civilian side, could be justified in moving the Government to a consideration, the Government must at the same time be allowed to determine how and when to deal with the delinquents. This would seem to be especially necessary in the present case, the more so before the High Court makes its own recommendation to Government on going into the merits of the Mámlatdárs' case.

15. On the subject of the protests of the Honourable Messrs. Jardine and Birdwood, the Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 28th January, writes:—That the Judges of the High Court as a body, and any of the Judges individually, are entitled to protest against the retention in office of corrupt men, when those men are charged with the administration of civil or criminal justice, goes without saying. The High Court is the protector of people's rights and liberties, and the rule of English law is wholesome which holds that a judge is within his rights in requesting the ruling authority not to appoint or keep in office corrupt men. But that is not the only question in the present case. There is another question, namely, whether Mr. Justice Jardine and Mr. Justice Birdwood had mooted the point at the proper time? The Government of Bombay could not have given any other reply to the minutes of the two Judges. The Government says, in short, that it would be inexpedient and unfair to sit in judgment on the conduct of the said Magistrates, while, on the one hand, the Crawford Commission is engaged in investigating the charges against Mr. Crawford, and while on the other the High Court has called upon the Magistrates to show cause why they should not be prosecuted on the strength of their own statements. The protests of the two Honourable Judges of the High Court were undoubtedly prompted by their desire to see the administration of criminal justice in this presidency conducted by none but honest officers. That is certainly a very laudable desire, and it speaks much to the credit of Mr. Justice Jardine that in an elaborate and learned minute he has clearly shown that in asking the Government to remove from their magisterial seats the officers who have confessed to having bought their offices by the payment of bribes he was discharging his duty as a Judge of the highest court of justice in the presidency. But we can scarcely help thinking that the minutes were premature, and it would have been better if the two Judges had waited till the Crawford Commission delivered its judgment. While expressing our humble opinion in favour of the view which the Bombay Government has taken of the point mooted in the minutes of the two Judges, we feel it necessary to say that the tone of the Government resolution is unnecessarily harsh. The term "extra-judicial denunciation" applied by the Government to the minutes of the Judges is more vigorous than wise, and detracts from the official dignity which ought to be preserved in every resolution emanating from the Secretariat. Mr. Justice Jardine having been careful to inform the Government that he sympathised with its endeavours to free the administration from all corrupt elements, and that he sent in his minute in the discharge of his duty, the Government should have appreciated that assurance of his, and not gone out of its way to rebuke him in language which suits a newspaper article better than an official document.

16. The Subodh Patrika (16), in its issue of the 27th January, writes:—The Honourable Judges of the High Court who have exhausted all precedents, old and new, to establish the proposition that judicial officers of the Crown who have admittedly purchased their offices should not be retained in the public service, have shown a commendable zeal for the purity of the administration. The Executive Government, however, finds it more convenient to refrain from carrying out their recommendations till the officers concerned have been heard in their defence, and it is impossible to say that the latter course is not both judicial and judicious. But to a lay mind, some further considerations present themselves which seem to enjoin caution in the treatment of these officers. If the revelations made by them are true, they argue a state of corruption in which the gentlemen who have admitted their guilt are presumably not the only offenders. Is it advisable or expedient that those who have admitted their guilt and helped to reveal the state of corruption, as well as gone through the humiliation of a public avowal of the part they have played therein, should be removed from office, whilst those who have possibly been equally guilty, but have done none of these things, are continued in the discharge of their public duties? Moreover, if there is any indemnity at all promised, public interests would seem to require that it should be scrupulously observed. What is equally pertinent to note is that these officers have now become marked men and they know as much. May not that circumstance suffice to keep them straight in future? An Executive Government is, we should think, bound to consider all such circumstances before it commits itself to any definite action in the matter, although it may be that none of them have been sanctioned by the high authority of Coke or Littleton or Bacon's Abridgement as extenuating the guilt of the original offence.

17. The Gujaráti (78), in its issue of the 27th January, writes:—We welcome the minutes of the two learned Judges of the High Court who asked the Bombay Government to take hasty and premature action against the Mámlatdárs who have confessed to the purchase of their offices by bribery and corruption, simply because they afford a striking testimony of the remarkable independence of our High Court Judges. If they had been more dependent on Government, the learned minutes would not most probably have been written. It is this very consciousness of the advantages of separating the judicial and executive functions that has led the Indian National Congress to pass a resolution on the subject, and those who have any experience of the mofussil will readily admit that the administration of the forest and excise laws would be more lenient and humane if Magistrates were purely judicial officers who could not possibly be influenced by any demi-official communications regarding their executive functions. We are, however, constrained to say that the action taken by the two eminent Judges, evidently in the interests of justice, was certainly not calculated to promote the laudable object they had sincerely in view, since it tended to embarrass Government at a time when its action was being guided by deeper considerations than those of which alone the learned Judges took cognizance in their minutes. [The Gujarát Gazette (77), in its issue of the 31st January, expresses similar sentiments.]

18. Referring to the protest of Justices Birdwood and Jardine with regard to the self-condemned Mámlatdárs, the Arunodayă (20), in its issue of the 27th January, says:—There is nothing improper in the protest of the High Court Judges. But the chief thing to be borne in mind is that if men like Sindekar had not made a clean breast of the matter, the dark deeds of a shrewd and clever high officer like Mr. Crawford would never have been exposed and Government could not have taken the present action against him. It should be further borne in mind with regard to Sindekar that the cause of his giving a bribe to Mr. Crawford was different from that of others concerned in this case. From his evidence it seems that he gave a bribe with a view to get promotion. Those who have given evidence before the Commission seem to have been assured of protection from harm by Government; for, those who refused to make confessions are still under suspension according to their evidence before the Commission. We are not disposed to comment on the steps which were taken by Government in procuring proof, yet it can safely be said that whatever they have done they must have done after full consideration, and that nobody can blame them for it. Considering the difficulty and responsibility of procuring evidence in important cases like those of bribery and rape, it must be said that Government have got evidence in the present case without having recourse to very questionable means. It will at present suffice to say that if Government have at all given oral assurances to some people, they must not set them aside, however strongly they may be recommended to do so by the High Court Judges. We dare say that the exposure of the conduct of Mr. Crawford has opened the eyes of Government officers, and that they will hereafter avoid doing anything illegal or irregular.

Regimental sepoys proceeding home on sick leave experience much inconvenience in the third class on the railway and steamer for which they are granted passes.

19. A correspondent of the Pandit (159), in its issue of the 1st February, says:—Regimental sepoys proceeding to their native country on sick leave are allowed third class railway and sea warrants. But the crowd in this class of land and sea vehicles is so great that the sick men cannot sit with ease and comfort, but have a rough passage home. This must be one of the reasons why many of the sepoys proceeding on sick leave die before or soon after they reach home. It is therefore to be hoped that they will be granted second class passages, both by rail and by steamer.

Approval of the alleged proposal to abolish the posts of Special Judges under the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act.

20. The Arunodayă (20), in its issue of the 27th January, refers to the alleged proposal to abolish the posts of Special Judges under the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act and expresses approval of the proposal, observing that if with his usual wakefulness to the interests of the public His Excellency Lord Reay gets the odious Act repealed or its operation suspended, His Lordship will greatly benefit the people and earn their blessings.

Necessity for making the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act applicable to the Khándesh District.

21. The Khándesh Vaibhav (41), in its issue of the 25th January, says that the cultivators in Khándesh are harassed and ruined in innumerable ways by their creditors, and are reduced to the necessity of incurring heavy debts in connection with their land and cattle, and hopes that Government will make the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act applicable to Khándesh.

The results of insufficient crops in the Panch Máhals District.

22. A correspondent of the Anonymous (89), in its issue of the 27th January, says:—The people of the Panch Mahâls District are much concerned at the insufficient crops of this year, and the poor classes are starving. The crime of theft is on the increase throughout the district, and the police ought to take due steps in regard to this evil.

A revenue appointment in the Dhárwár District found fault with.

23. The Dhárwár Vritt (27), in its issue of the 31st January, finds fault with the appointment of Mr. Shivrudra Madivallaya Pandit as Deputy Chitnis to the Collector of Dhárwar as being in supersession of the claims of eleven other men and in transgression of the Government rule of the 2nd September 1885, according to which reserved posts, of which that of Deputy Chitnis is one, should be conferred in the order of the date of passing the Lower Standard Examination, thinks that such strict rules about appointments and promotion made by Government are more often broken by district authorities than by Divisional Commissioners, and hopes that Mr. Propert will attend to the irregular appointment above referred to and rectify the mistake and remove the chance of there being disorder throughout in consequence of such irregular appointments.

Alleged incomplete enquiry into the charge of asking a bribe of Rs. 2,000 brought against Mr. Sakhárám Lakshman, late Hospital Assistant at Tásgaon.

24. Referring to the trial and acquittal by Mr. Scott, District Deputy Collector, Sátára, of Mr. Sakhárám Lakshman, late Hospital Assistant at Tásgaon, who was charged with asking a bribe of Rs. 2,000 from one Mr. Jog of Tásgaon in connection with the death of the latter's brother, the Chandánshu (24), in its issue of the 27th January, says:—The accused has been discharged before examining all the witnesses for the prosecution, and those witnesses who were examined were not interrogated on many important points. We therefore say that the enquiry has been incomplete, and hope that Government will take steps to have a due and full enquiry made afresh.

An accusation against Mr. Gopálshankar Venishankar, the late Mámlatdár of Kapadvanj.

25. The Satyavakta (128), in its issue of the 1st February, observes that it has been found out in the cases of Chunilál Mahásukh accused of corruption, and of Damodardás Bháichand charged with having uttered false coin, that Mr. Gopálshankar Venishankar, the late Mámlatdár of Kapadvanj, got up these charges against the accused both of whom have been found not guilty. The paper recommends Government to enquire into the conduct of the Mámlatdár and to punish him if found guilty of misconduct.

Remarks on the conduct of the Mukhtiárkar at Sukkur.

26. A correspondent, writing from Sukkur to the Phœnix (3) in its issue of the 26th January, says:—The Mukhtiárkar of Sukkur entertains a strong dislike to compromises, and what is creditable to him is that he makes no secret of it. An Arab, a cultivator, wanted to withdraw his complaint lying before the Mukhtiárkar, as he had, he said, effected a compromise with the aggressor, the alleged offence being of course compoundable. The irate Court remonstrated against this course, but the Arab persisting, it worked itself to a white heat and ordered him to be shaken by the beard and to have shoes laid across his back. It is reported that this is a common occurrence in that Court, and that the chaprasis are instructed not to pay much heed to the first order to that effect, but that if the order is thrice repeated—another version makes it seven times—it is to be taken seriously and put into execution promptly. This time the order seems to have been repeated the requisite number of times, for a chaprasi was soon found holding the Arab's beard in one hand and moving it fast like a fancy fan, while with the other he let fall a shoe upon his back and body like a hammer upon an anvil, and from his foul mouth hurled a number of unsavoury imputations upon the honesty and chastity of his different relatives, distant and near, male and female. The Arab then laid a criminal complaint before Mr. Neale, the City Magistrate, against our worthy Mukhtiárkar, and summoned the latter's head munshi and other establishment as witnesses. The affair at this juncture threatened to take a very serious turn. But some three gentlemen, for convenience' sake I will call them Messrs. A., P. Mal. and D. Das, interceded on behalf of Mr. Lalomal, the Mukhtiárkar, and brought the Arab round to effect a compromise. But as Mr. Lalomal's ill-luck would have it, the Arab at the time of the hearing of the case by Mr. Neale made a clean breast of the compulsion brought to bear upon him to induce him to agree to a compromise. The City Magistrate under the circumstances at first refused to allow the compromise to stand and the case to be withdrawn, but after all he gave in, though not without report of all the circumstances to the District Magistrate, at the remonstrance of Mr. Pesumal, Mr. Lalomal's pleader, who urged that the Magistrate was bound by law to accept the compromise, no matter how and by what means it had been agreed to.

The above is a statement of reported facts minus some details. For the comments thereon and as to the fitness or otherwise of such a high-handed despot dressed in little brief authority, continuing in Government service as a Magistrate, I leave it to your readers to draw upon their own resources and judge for themselves. I need only add here that this is only one of the several instances of his high-handedness which have come to my notice, e. g., the Rustom stable incident, the fracas with one of his Munshis, the incident connected with the bullock purchased by him for an official, his behaviour in a case of Bráhmins, &c. &c.

Paucity of vakils at Dholka in the Ahmedabad District.

27. A correspondent of the Hitechchhu (80) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 31st January, says:—There are only two vakils attached to the Subordinate Judge's Court at Dholka, and when one of the parties in a case employes both of them, the other party has to go without a pleader or to get one from Ahmedabad. This state of things has caused great inconvenience to litigants, and it behoves the District Judge of Ahmedabad to remove the inconvenience by sending a few more vakils to Dholka.

The cruel practice of slaughtering buffaloes at the annual fair of a shrine in the village of Mánjri in the Chikodi Táluka, Belgaum District.

28. A correspondent, writing from Saundatti to the Vidya Vilas (67) in its issue of the 25th January, says that at the annual fair in the Hindu month of Pausha last, at the shrine of "Lakshmi" in the village of Mánjri in the Chikodi Táluka of the Belgaum District, forty-eight buffaloes were slaughtered, that the number of these animals killed every year at this fair is larger than that above mentioned, not to speak of the number of goats and fowl sacrificed in addition, and that Government should at once put a stop to such atrocities as these, and asks how they have not attracted the attention of the Indian reformers.

Overcrowding of passengers in native craft and steamers.

29. The Subodh Patrika (16), in its issue of the 27th January, says that the dangerous practice of carrying in native craft and steamers passengers far in excess of the prescribed limit prevails extensively, and that the fine of Rs. 20 inflicted on one Mahammad by Mr. Cooper, Chief Presidency Magistrate, Bombay, for carrying in his boat 99 passengers in excess of the prescribed number is not in the opinion of the public such as would deter others from committing the offence, and remarks that the Magistrates and the police should keep a strict eye on these men for some days more.

Inadvisability of charging for medicines dispensed from Government dispensaries like that in the village of Tháru Sháh in Sind.

30. A correspondent from Tháru Sháh, writing to the Sind Sudhár (164) in its issue of the 19th January, says:—The doctors heretofore appointed to the charge of the Tháru Sháh medical dispensary used to work cheerfully and zealously and helped the patients by all means in their power. They were even so considerate as to visit their patients at their private residences, without charging fees for attendance, except in very few cases. This induced people to come to Tháru Sháh from a distance of 20 or 30 koss for medical advice and treatment. The name of Dr. Ráoji is still as well-known in the town of Tháru Sháh as that of Dr. Holmsted at Hyderabad. The gentleman now appointed Hospital Assistant at Tháru Sháh is a Christian, but he is not at all acquainted with the manners and customs of the people. He never shows his nose in the town. Besides, under the rules recently issued, medicines are charged for. Mr. Editor, it is surely a matter for consideration whether this is right in a small country town like Tháru Sháh, where education is very backward and where the people do not as yet appreciate the value of the English medicines, where, too, the number of well-to-do persons is limited and where the number of patients is small compared with that in large towns. The promulgation of rules like these must dissuade many people from resorting to the dispensary or English medicines. There may be no harm in applying such rules to large towns, where the inhabitants are educated and can appreciate the value of English medicines and can afford to pay for them; but in small towns like Tháru Sháh, where the population is hardly two thousand souls, it appears inadvisable to issue such strict rules. At Tháru Sháh there are one or two Native quacks and their treatment is dangerous. The abolition of the rules we have spoken of would be a great boon to the public and would save them from applying to quacks.

A Pársi young man plundered on the Esplanade in Bombay.

31. The Kaiser-i-Hind (111), in its issue of the 27th January, says:—While a Pársi young man by name Frámroz Kharsetji Bápuji Jasáwála was passing on the road near the Cama Hospital at about half-past seven on the evening of Friday last, two or three badmashes pounced upon him, overpowered him, gagged him, and after severely beating him robbed him of his money bag containing one rupee in cash and his cap, and decamped. It is said that the young man is dangerously ill.

Insecurity of the Cruickshank Road on the Esplanade in Bombay.

32. The Akhbáre Sodágar (88), in its issue of the 1st February, says:—The Cruickshank Road on the Esplanade is more frequented than the Esplanade main road, and yet no policeman is posted at night on the former road, as is done at the middle of the latter road. The cause of this seems to be that the Cruickshank Road is used by Natives while the main road is frequented by Europeans. On the Cruickshank Road a Hindu man and a woman were assaulted and plundered by a soldier of the Marine Battalion a short time ago, and had a policeman been posted on this road since the occurrence, a Pársi young man would not have been seriously assaulted and plundered as he was lately. The highway-men have become bolder than before on this particular road. Formerly they threatened a man and plundered him; now they gag their victim and plunder him after severely assaulting him, as the Pársi young man was treated.

The police on the road between Mehmadabad and Kaira do not do their work properly.

33. A correspondent of the Káthiáwádi (81), in its issue of the 29th January, says:—Government have placed police stations on the road between Mehmadabad and Kaira for the purpose of escorting the railway passengers who arrive by the mail train at Kaira. But it is said that the police do not do this work properly. The authorities concerned ought to see to this complaint.

Danger on the road between Tatta and Jungsháhi in Sind.

34. The Sind Sudhár (164), in its issue of the 19th January, says:—The road between Tatta and Jungsháhi is very dangerous at night. People from Tatta complain that on the road they are much frightened and annoyed by Jats (roughs). If these complaints are true, it is absolutely necessary to make some satisfactory arrangements, or else very serious results may occur.

Complaint about half-anna postage envelopes.

35. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 27th January, writes:—We had to complain more than once, in the course of last year, of half-anna postage stamps that would not stick. The grievance seems to be in a fair way of being redressed. For, with the advent of the new year, we are having half-anna envelopes also, with their flaps unstickable. Here is material for a chapter on the humours of the Post Office. The matter is anything but trifling to those who have a score and a half of letters to despatch on an average every day, after gumming the stamp or the flap of the cover for each.

Insufficient establishment in the City Post Office, Poona, and the inconvenience caused to the local merchants thereby.

36. The Jagaddhitechchhu (13), in its issue of the 26th January, says that on account of an insufficient establishment in the City Post Office, Poona, the despatch of value-payable parcels is delayed for two or three days to the great inconvenience and loss to merchants, and hopes that the postal authorities concerned will attend to the matter.

Part II.—Legislation.

A suggestion in connection with the Merchandise Marks Bill.

37. In alluding to the Merchandise Marks Bill, the Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 28th January, says:—It is desirable in the interests of the public as well as the manufacturers of Europe wines and spirits that the Bill should contain a provision prohibiting the bottling of inferior brands in empty bottles with old labels on them. This kind of fraud is extensively practised in India, wines and spirits ordered out from Europe in wood being bottled here in bottles with old labels and sold to the public as the brand of the distillers or shippers whose name is borne on the label. To put down this sort of fraud successfully, it is desirable that the sale of empty bottles with old labels on them by dealers in old bottles and the bottling of inferior brands in such bottles should be made penal. [The Rást Goftár (83), in its issue of the 27th January, maintains that the Merchandise Marks Bill will only serve to protect the interests of certain monopolists, and that there is no necessity for it as the Indian Penal Code provides an adequate punishment for false marking.]

Remarks on the Bombay Village Sanitation Bill.

38. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 28th January, approves of the Bombay Village Sanitation Bill proposed to be introduced into the Bombay Legislative Council, and admits the necessity for a measure like this to ensure proper sanitation in villages, but disapproves of any additional tax being imposed upon the villagers on that score, on the ground that they are already overtaxed and reduced to penury, and proposes that the expenses of village conservancy should be defrayed from the local funds which are contributed to by the cultivators. With regard to the constitution of the sanitation boards, the paper suggests that they should have a professional medical man appointed as one of their members in order that the other members may get the advantage of his scientific knowledge in their deliberations and measures. [The Satyă Shodhak (58), in its issue of the 27th January, also approves of the motives of Government in bringing forward this Bill, but hopes that like many of the present municipalities the sanitary boards will not be simply annoying and tax-collecting bodies, but will be the means of doing some positive good to villagers. This paper is, however, of opinion that this legislative measure need not be brought into force in the villages of the Ratnágiri District where a thin population and good running water are the natural preservers of cleanliness and public health, though in places which lack these natural advantages this gentle enactment, as it is called, may, if gently worked, without doubt, prove beneficial. The Suryodayă (64) of the 28th January disapproves of the Bill in question as being likely to add to the various imposts under the weight of which the people are at present groaning. The Arunodayă (20), in its issue of the 27th January, says that it is a matter for joy that the Government have now begun to approve of the old Pancháyat system, that it appears that the Bill, if passed, would do much good to the people, that now-a-days the views of the Bombay Government seem to have taken a somewhat different turn, and that if the present Governor continues to rule over this presidency for a few years more it is likely to derive many more benefits from his administration.]

Part III.—Education.

The percentage of educated men in India and the measures which Government ought to adopt to provide employment for them.

39. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 27th January, writes:—The Convocation addresses of the Chancellor and the Vice-Chancellor of the Calcutta University were brief, but their interest and importance cannot be overrated, each in its own line. The Chancellor, Lord Lansdowne, denied the existence, which is largely believed in by the Native community, of any alarm on the part of the Government at the rapid increase of general education among the people, or, as a consequence, of the intention of a reactionary policy; but His Excellency added at the same time that, "we must not disguise it from ourselves that if schools and colleges continue to educate Indian youths at the present rate, we are likely to hear more than we do at present of the complaint that we are turning out every year young men whom we have provided with an intellectual equipment practically useless to the recipients owing to the small number of openings for them." This want of employment for our educated men is experienced generally, and hence the cry for the establishment of technical schools and the rush of young men towards it where one is opened. To begin with, we beg to enquire if literary education has really made great strides in India. From the language "if our schools and colleges continue to educate the youth of India at the present rate" one would be led to imagine that ninety-five persons out of every hundred of the population were passing through the University course and seeking employment in the public service and the professions. But what is the fact? If Lord Dufferin's own figures are to be relied on, they point to a different conclusion. Instead of ninety-five, only six per cent. are educated, and of these six, only one knows English; of the one per cent. knowing English, hardly more than one-fourth, we believe, passes through college or University course, and thus the number of Indian youths intellectually equipped and seeking employment is literally infinitesimal compared with our 250,000,000 of population. Why then does that number appear so vast relative to the field of employment? It does so simply because the field open to Natives is limited to a degree nowhere else to be observed. The first remedy, then, is to extend that field in the various branches of the public service, viz., the revenue, the judicial, the police, the forest, the engineering, the telegraph and other departments. This journal is not likely to be accused of underrating the importance of European supervision, but consistently with that principle, we believe qualified Natives could be safely employed to a much greater extent than they now are. There is no reason why Cooper's Hill College should be maintained in England at India's expense and its students given a monopoly of office to our double injury. The Engineering Colleges in India might be strengthened, and the services recruited therefrom mainly, though not entirely. Then again, a local supply of competent hands might be created for the forest, the telegraph and other technical departments by opening institutions for instruction in those lines, and to them might be added mechanical training—not only the mint, the dockyard and other Government establishments requiring skilled agency, but even railways, the interest on which is a burden on the Indian tax-payer, might be called on to employ those who would acquire the necessary proficiency therein. It is not in the interests of the pure Native alone that we advocate this policy. There are thousands and thousands of European and Eurasian children growing up in the country whom the Government cannot or will not employ in its military service, and who must yet be fed. What then is to become of them, as of the children of the soil, if all its departments are to be worked by an agency imported from Europe at immense cost? The next is the question of technical schools properly so called, that is, schools for instruction in the practical arts. It is not enough to establish them and to turn out instructed scholars. They, like the literary graduates, will not know what to do with their equipments unless factories and other industries exist to develop the resources of the country and offer them a field for employment, and no industries can be created without capital and commercial enterprise. Wherever these are forthcoming, due encouragement must be held out to them at the same time that technical instruction is fostered. The policy of purchasing locally made stores in preference to imports, inaugurated five years ago, also requires to be perseveringly followed, but there is no sign that it is so treated at present. The last point connected with the subject is the amount of the educational grant. The continent of India was enveloped in ignorance and darkness, and the British Government generously undertook to dispel these. Now, three-quarters per cent., or twelve annas in every hundred rupees of the revenue, is surely a small amount, and, as advocated by the late Sir A. Grant and other educationists, it ought to be raised to two or at least one and a half per cent., and then Government might distribute it as they thought best. But any curtailment of the present pittance cannot but tend to produce uneasiness and distrust in the public mind, even when no reaction in the policy is contemplated.

His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's speech at the Convocation of the Calcutta University and the scheme of the enhancement of fees in high schools in the Bombay Presidency.

40. The Kannadă Suvárte (141), in its issue of the 25th January, says:—Though His Excellency Lord Reay in his Convocation speech was quite silent on the point of the educational policy of Government, Lord Lansdowne in his speech at Calcutta, however, said that Government would not reduce the expenditure on State education. Such an assurance at this time will set the minds of the people at rest. Now though Government do not wish to abolish high schools, still the proposed increase in the fees shows that they desire to throw an impediment in that direction. The tuition fees of the Deccan College have been raised from Rs. 5 to Rs. 10, and the proposed enhancement of fees in high schools would tell heavily upon many a poor student.

41. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 27th January, writes:—On the whole, His Excellency the Viceroy's speech at the Calcutta University Convocation was most practical and instructive, and leads us to expect that during his rule we need not be afraid that prejudice will get the better of common sense.

42. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 26th January, writes:—While the topic of the day on this side of India is Lord Reay's Convocation speech and his reticence about the educational policy of the Bombay Government, Calcutta is fortunate enough to receive at first hand the declaration, by no less a personage than Lord Lansdowne himself, of the policy of the Supreme Government in regard to education. As Chancellor of the University he says: "There is an impression in some quarters that Government has made up its mind to stint high education of the means which it requires. I do not think that there is the least likelihood that any such reactionary policy will be pursued either by the Government of India or by the Provincial Governments." The above is a clear hint that the Provincial Governments, burdened as they have been by enormous imperial demands, should leave the Educational Department unsheared as far as practicable. Pursuant to this policy the Bombay Government should reconsider the question of raising the fees in high schools.

43. A correspondent, writing from Shikárpur to the Phœnix (3) in its issue of the 26th January, says:—Only the other day a cry was raised in the Phœnix that the contemplated enhancement of fees in the Hyderabad High School would tell heavily upon the educational advancement there, by confining the benefits of education to the rich few who could afford to pay for the costly luxury. But from Hyderabad to Shikárpur is not a long distance, and the incubus of enhanced fees has already travelled over here. If Hyderabad cannot bear an increased burden in that direction, much less can the benighted Shikárpur do, where the people have only just begun to appreciate the advantage of sending children to school over apprenticing them in shops. Only a short time back the fees were raised here on a scale hardly justifiable by the condition of the people, but it requires no ghost to foretell that any further increase in them or any other impediment thrown in that direction would be a straight way to closing the high school sooner or later. A fair estimate of the scare that this bugbear of revised rates of fees has caused here may be made by the fact that a few days back a large public meeting of the phlegmatic inhabitants of this place was held in the commodious municipal hall to consider the question in all its bearings. Just at the appointed time the hall was filled with a mixed audience composed of Sethiás, Bhátiás, other Hindus and Mahomedans. Khán Bahádur Sidik Ali, Deputy Collector, Upper Sind Frontier, was voted to the chair, and in a lucid discourse he explained the object of the meeting. Though great enthusiasm and excitement prevailed at the meeting, yet it was most orderly. After a threadbare discussion of the question of fees in all its details, it was unanimously resolved to memorialize the Educational Inspector in Sind, and through him the Director of Public Instruction at Poona, to reconsider the question of raising fees in the Shikárpur High School if there was any truth in the rumours to that effect. It was also resolved to invoke the paternal help of the district Government, Colonel Mayhew, in the matter.

Agitation against the present educational policy of Government recommended.

44. The Bakul (22), in its issue of the 27th January, says that it is good that "the policy of Government with regard to high and secondary education" is one of the subjects for which prizes are to be awarded at the forthcoming Poona Elocution Gathering, suggests all elocution societies on this side of India to appoint this as one of the subjects for prizes to be given by them, and observes that people should hold public meetings in different parts of the country and inform Government with much regret that India is the most backward of all countries in point of education, that no country spends so small an amount on education as India does, that both these things are most discreditable to the British Indian administration, and that Government should soon reconsider the matter and allay the anxiety of the people.

The posts of Educational Inspectors and Director of Public Instruction considered to be needless burdens on the educational budget.

45. The Vártáhar (19), in its issue of the 27th January, writes:—It is not only Poona and Ahmednagar High Schools that are threatened with abolition, but the municipality of Ahmedabad is called upon to contribute a pretty round sum annually towards the maintenance of the high school of that city. The fees there have already been doubled and there is no room for further increase. It seems to us, however, that the policy of retrenchment which the Government usually pursues is wrong altogether. Instead of curtailing expenditure on high schools, why not reduce the highly paid salaries of the head masters and their assistants, which can conveniently be done? The inspectoral and directing agency is a needless burden on the educational budget. It is an open question whether the Inspectors and the Director do at all visit the high schools and colleges regularly, just as a Collector personally visits his tálukas and points out the defects inherent in the procedure of collecting revenue or keeping accounts. We have reason to believe that they move their tents from one place to another without inspecting the schools within their charge. They are not paid simply for carrying on correspondence, but they should impart instruction by means of lectures, personal supervision and the like, infusing awe among the teachers and the pupils. The late lamented Mr. E. I. Howard used to do this always. He inspected high schools with Professors like Mr. Sidney Owen, and lectured to college students on literary and legal subjects very often. But the good old days are gone. At present there is all show and enormous expenditure, exhibiting red-tapeism, but nothing substantial, so to say.

Approval of the appointment of Messrs. Dayárám Gidumal and Ali Mahomed Hasanali as University Fellows.

46. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 26th January, writes:—It is gratifying to see that in the list of Fellows of the Bombay University appointed this year, two Sindhi names appear. Messrs. Dayárám Gidumal and Ali Mahomed Hasanali are the fortunate recipients of the honour. Mr. Dayárám, as everybody knows, is a distinguished graduate of the Bombay University in arts and law and is now Assistant Sessions Judge at Ahmedabad where he is doing good work in more ways than one. It is needless to say anything to justify his nomination. The regret is that he was not appointed earlier. Mr. Ali Mahomed is also a Bachelor of Arts and Law and holds the appointment of a Subordinate Judge in that province. He was recently appointed an examiner in Persian by the Bombay University. These appointments indicate the attention Sind is receiving at the hands of His Excellency Lord Reay. Sind was heretofore quite a neglected province, but His Lordship has already done much and we hope he will do still more to remove the reproach.

A request to the Bombay University to hold the Matriculation Examination once more before September next.

47. The Dnyán Chakshu (9), in its issue of the 30th January, says that as the Matriculation Examination of the Bombay University is to cease as an examination qualifying for Government service from September next, the University will do well to comply with the request of the students who failed in that examination last year, to give them one more chance by holding the examination once more between the months of April and September next.

An irregularity in connection with the late municipal elections at Bombay.

48. Referring to the last general election of members for the Bombay Municipal Corporation, the Din Bandhu (7), in its issue of the 27th January, says that it was a sorry spectacle to notice the manner in which the men engaged by the candidates in the Byculla Ward for securing votes for them behaved among themselves, that abusive words and strong epithets were freely used by these underlings to one another, and that one of the candidates in that ward resorted to dishonest means in securing votes for himself inasmuch as he brought people to vote for him in the name of rate-payers who were absent from Bombay on that day, and in one case votes had been taken in the name of a rate-payer who was dead. The paper further requests the rate-payers and the Government to consider how far it will be graceful to the Bombay Municipal Corporation to have such a man returned as its member.

49. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 28th January, writes:—A correspondent of our contemporary of the Advocate of India brings to light the condition into which municipal government has fallen in certain parts of Gujarát. The municipal corporation of Surat has become, according to the correspondent's description of it, "a fish market." The president's authority is not respected; there are factions in the body, and class, not to say caste, jealousies are prominently visible. If this is all true, then the conduct of those who are helping to throw the cause of local self-government in Surat into discredit deserves censure. No doubt every due allowance must be made for the drawbacks of municipal government in this country, since it is a new experiment and success in all points cannot be expected in a short time. But there is no excuse for racial, class, or caste jealousies when these are imported into the conduct of municipal affairs, and members of municipal bodies waste their time and enthusiasm in fighting about personal matters, neglecting their primary duty of meeting the sanitary wants of the people for whom they hold their offices in trust. We hope sincerely that the municipality of Surat will mend its ways, supposing it is true that it is now wasting its energies over useless questions.

PART V.—Native States.

Complaints against the Political Agency in Káthiáwár.

50. In a leader headed "Plunder in Native States by the employés of the Political Agency," the Nyáyadarshak (119), in its issue of the 28th January, says:—There are very few European officers who do not pay at all for the provisions purchased by them while out in the districts. Many of them do pay half or three-fourths of the money they owe for the purchases they make. But as regards the travelling of political officers, whatever be the position of the Chief into whose territory they go, he considers their visit as a great infliction, because he has not only to supply provisions, but has to make presents, and ninety per cent. of the political officers are said to be confirmed corrupt officials. If Government are desirous of ascertaining the truth of the above statements, let an enquiry be made by a commission composed of five honest and independent Europeans and the same number of Natives. The commission ought to call upon every servant of the Agency to give proofs of whence and for what price he purchased the articles in his possession and to produce an account of the payments made by him for the provisions and fodder used by him while on circuit. The Native Chiefs of all grades should be asked to give with convincing proofs the names of the officials to whom payments have been made by them, on promise that half of the amount recovered from the corrupt officials will be returned to them and that they will be protected from harm. If these steps be taken, the people of Káthiáwár believe that ninety per cent. of the Government employés will be found to be corrupt. When one hears an account of such things given by the Káthiáwáris, he is led to infer that whenever the Political Agent or his Assistant visits a Native State, every member of his establishment is supplied with provisions by the State and that an expenditure of about Rs. 200 per day is incurred on account of the officer himself besides the Nazrána (bribe) paid him. It would not be wrong to call this bribe a plunder of a Native State. Since the Government of Bombay have prevented their servants from accepting presents of fruit, they cannot rightly permit their Agents to receive from the Native States presents of provisions and spirits for men and fodder and grain for their animals, and if this be the case, why should not the receiver of provisions and other things be duly punished?

Colonel Watson, Political Agent, Káthiáwár, censured for supporting Mr. Sims and the Chief of Bhávnagar.

51. The same newspaper contains a communication, in which the writer censures Colonel J. W. Watson, Political Agent, Káthiáwár, for dismissing without enquiry a complaint laid before him by Vakil Chhaganlál Sundarji, a resident of Wadhwán, against Mr. R. Proctor Sims for libel and criminal intimidation on the plea of there being no ground for making it, and says:—Colonel Watson does not seem to have made any efforts to improve the administration of the Bhávnagar State, the subjects of which are being ground down with oppression and tyranny and the Chief of which is very vicious. Colonel Watson supports Mr. Sims, who is his friend and whose great influence with the Chief has been the cause of much oppression over the subjects. It is a very serious matter that he should also support the Chief who deserves to be dethroned.

A change in the Kárbhári and other officers in the Sávantvádi State recommended.

52. The Din Bandhu (7), in its issue of the 27th January, says that His Excellency Lord Reay will highly oblige the subjects of the Sávantvádi State by changing the present Kárbhári and other officers of the State and thereby trying to improve the conduct of the Sar Desái, and that it is better to declare once for all that Bába Sáheb is unfit to become a ruler than to leave him in the hands of his unsympathetic officers. The paper adds that it is most unjust to say that Ráni Tárábái is a minor when she has actually completed her eighteenth year, and not to allow her full power with regard to her personal allowances, and hopes that Government will make an enquiry into the allegations of the Native newspapers before passing the usual remark that their allegations are groundless.

Recommendation to appoint an Assistant to the Judicial Commissioner.

The Pramod Sindhu (1), in its issue of the 25th January, writes:—Col. Mackenzie, Judicial Commissioner, Hyderabad Assigned Districts, has gone to Yeotmal for the sessions work. He is expected to return here in a day or two. He has worked very hard and disposed of many sessions cases. It is said that he is going to give civil cases a clear month. We have said many a time that it is necessary in the interests of suitors that some arrangements should be made to dispose of civil appeals accumulated during the past three years. It is not at all possible for one officer to get through this work, regard being had to the criminal cases which come up in all the districts. We hope that the Resident will take some steps to relieve the Judicial Commissioner of the civil work by giving him an Assistant.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Part I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Mr. Caine's reply to the address presented to him by the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha.

1. In alluding to the reply given by Mr. Caine, M. P., to the address presented to him by the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha, the Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 5th February, says:—The high opinion about the Indian National Congress expressed by Mr. Caine from personal knowledge is a great gain to India, since it serves the good purpose of silencing the opponents of the Congress, who have been indiscreet enough to accuse it of disloyalty and incitement. Mr. Caine is an independent and impartial witness, who has seen and heard a great deal about the Congress, and his evidence giving a high character to it must go a great way in support of its good intentions and discreet and moderate conduct. Taking his cue from the allegation of the opponents, Mr. Caine has warned the Congress against desiring an Indian parliament, but no such desire was ever entertained, and the warning, though well intentioned, must be pronounced to be redundant.

Report about Mr. A. T. Crawford being acquitted by the Commission of the charges of corruption.

2. In noticing the report that the Commission appointed to enquire into the charges brought against Mr. Arthur Crawford has acquitted him of all the charges of bribery and found him guilty of only improper borrowing, the Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 4th February, says:—Persons who have carefully gone through the proceedings held before the Crawford Commission could not come to any other conclusion than that said to be arrived at by the Commissioners, and the opinion of the general public being to the same effect the report is most likely to be a correct one. It is however to be hoped that the Bombay Government will soon obtain the permission of Lord Cross to publish the Commission's report for the purpose of removing public anxiety on the subject. [The Dnyán Prakásh (11) of the 7th idem concurring with the Jáme Jamshed thinks that the announcement of the acquittal will come as a surprise upon no one except a few fanatics in official and non-official circles, European and Native alike, who would convict Mr. Arthur Crawford even on the Koregaon Pátil's (Ganpatráo Bárge's) case, and who would, without being thoroughly conscious of the mischievous effect of the precedent they would thus set, with an easy conscience convict on slender or insufficient judicial evidence any person whatever on any charge, provided there existed against that person in respect of that charge as strong a prejudice as admittedly exists against Mr. Arthur Crawford in respect of his alleged wide corruption. While the Kesari (39) of the 5th February is unable to persuade itself to place reliance upon the rumoured acquittal on the ground of its improbability, and thinks that if the rumour turns out true the popular belief about the uselessness of the present system of British administrative justice will be confirmed, the Hitechchhu (80) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 7th February, says that from the efforts made by Mr. Crawford's friends to suppress the truth the public had anticipated this result of the Commission, which, in its opinion, was unnecessarily appointed at such a heavy cost.]

The self-criminating Mámlatdárs in the Crawford case and exercise of magisterial powers by them.

3. While writing about the difference of opinion between some of the Judges of the Bombay High Court and the Government of His Excellency Lord Reay in regard to the Mámlatdárs who criminated themselves in giving evidence against Mr. Crawford, the Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 4th February, observes:—The conflict between the executive and the judiciary can have only one end, and sooner or later the former will have to give way to the latter. An important question of principle is involved in this unfortunate conflict, and no matter what pledge the executive may have authorized the Inspector-General of Police to give to the official witnesses in this case, that pledge cannot be allowed to override the important question of principle involved in this conflict of authority and jurisdiction between the executive and the judiciary. The utmost that those who have made the various confessions under the influence of a pledge are, in our opinion, entitled to in the event of its being proved that they have told the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, is that they should be protected against all penal consequences of their offence, and as far as possible should be retained in the public service in such posts only which do not carry with them any judicial functions.

4. The Shri Shiváji (61), in its issue of the 1st February, says that in order to preserve the fair name of British justice and to deter others from giving and receiving bribes, it is necessary that some punishment should be meted out to the Mámlatdárs who have deposed to having purchased their offices, and that the object will be almost secured if these Mámlatdárs are deprived of their magisterial powers. The poor Mámlatdárs, the paper says, should not be punished more severely than this, for the mismanagement which is now brought to light would not have existed if the officers of Government had exercised strict supervision and had been careful in discharging their duties. In short, Government are much to blame in this matter. It is therefore right that Government should neither carry out the recommendation of the two Judges of the Bombay High Court in its entirety, nor should they connive at the offences of the Mámlatdárs who have purchased their offices, but should only pass slight punishment on them.

5. The Dhárwár Vritt (27), in its issue of the 7th February, approves of the action of the Bombay High Court against the Mámlatdárs and says :—If the ends of justice can be secured through the High Court, Government should not be unwilling in the matter. In this way they will, without being liable to the charge of breaking their promises, accomplish what is required by justice. This course will, no doubt, make it difficult for Government to secure a similar game in future, but in our opinion this is not the way to catch it. Now some say that the Mámlatdárs were forced to give bribes, but this assertion is not borne out by evidence. Who will say that those who have tried to get promotion in supersession of the right claimants are not guilty? In short, those who have purchased their offices should be dismissed from the service, if not sentenced to imprisonment or fine.

6. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 30th January, writes :—No amount of pressure and no protective object can in the least diminish a shade of the dark crime of offering illegal gratification on the part of an official appointed by Her Majesty the Queen to dispense justice in her name. The Bombay Gazette evidently means to defend the Bombay Government in the act of its granting the corrupt Mámlatdárs indemnity from criminal prosecution and allowing them to continue in their office in spite of their proved corruption.

7. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 4th February, observes that the High Court Judges are quite right in the step they have taken, but that they should have waited a little longer, as Government rightly contend.

8. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 3rd February, writes :—The general principle that one who has violated the law by buying his appointment can never afterwards be expected to administer the law properly, will be readily accepted by all. But the main question is whether this general principle applies to the present case. Those who are insisting upon immediate dismissal of these officers simply betray a woeful ignorance of the circumstances or chain of events of which the confessions of these Mámlatdárs form but a link. The question as to the precise degree of guilt to be attributed to these Mámlatdárs is a delicate one. In the first place, there is the allegation that the Mámlatdárs paid under a sort of compulsion. Whether to believe this assertion or to reject it would depend upon the result of an inquiry. This inquiry, in order to be thorough and sifting, must not be confined to the few individuals who have been concerned in the Crawford inquiry. It is said that the system of coercion had forced not only the Mámlatdárs, but even the subordinate officers, to pay money and all those who had any business with the Commissioner. This will give a fairly accurate idea of the comprehensive nature of the inquiry that will have to be instituted. Then again the Government could not do anything before the report of the special Commission appointed to inquire into the allegations against Mr. Crawford submitted its report, which would, no doubt, throw a considerable light on the subject. All these considerations point to the conclusion that the line of conduct followed by Lord Reay's Government was the only reasonable one open to it. The London Times has betrayed a want of judicious patience in commenting upon this matter on the evidently one-sided information which was placed before it. In blaming His Excellency Lord Reay it has done injustice to that honest and conscientious administrator. It is to be feared that the Times will be followed by other English journals, and it behoves the Government of Lord Reay therefore to declare publicly once for all what it means to do with these Mámlatdárs and the reasons which have forced it to postpone any action in the matter up to now.

9. Referring to the agitation in England against the retention of the self-condemned Mámlatdárs in Government service, the Kesari (39), in its issue of the 5th February, says:—Even admitting the principle that the Mámlatdárs who have purchased their offices must necessarily recoup themselves by selling justice, should it not be considered whether their immoral conduct in this respect was voluntary or due to compulsion? The present agitation has made it clear that an enquiry into their conduct is necessary, and the sooner it is made the better, or else it is feared that His Excellency Lord Reay will be discredited in England by the criticisms of men who are ignorant of the real state of things. [The Bodh Sudhákar (6) of the 6th February pities the Mámlatdárs in their present plight, and says that it cannot understand how they can be said to be corrupt if the rumour of the acquittal of Mr. Crawford be true.]

10. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 3rd February, writes:—The London Times, we are told, considers that the action of His Excellency Lord Reay's Council on the protest of Justices Birdwood and Jardine, in the matter of Sindekar and Dabir, is amazing, and that "if this course is persisted in, the sooner the eyes of public opinion in England are opened the better." This virtuous indignation cannot fail to raise a smile in Bombay, where the true state of the whole case is known. If the Times were similarly well-informed, it would applaud instead of threatening the courageous conduct of the Government of His Excellency Lord Reay, which is no less anxious to purify the administration than the protesting Judges or the London newspapers. We wonder if that paper has been informed of the cause of the non est of the great champion of impartial justice—Sáthe of Poona—just at the moment he should have been present at the Bombay High Court in support of his nobly disinterested petition. Rumour has it that this Palladin of pure equity and justice was spirited out of British territory at the right moment by the same genius that had put him up to serve its own kaleidoscopic purpose. There are many Indian matters about which the conduct of many authorities is amazing, but on which the Times, perhaps, would be the last to write or exclaim, "the sooner the eyes of public opinion in England are opened, the better." The fact that a minority of the Judges of the High Court have moved the Government to take action forthwith is hardly calculated to weaken the position of His Excellency the Governor in Council, guided by many more considerations than those that prompt their worthy advisers in the High Court. And after all, the difference between the Government and the two or three Judges does not appear to be so grave as has been made out in some quarters. The Judges want the self-condemned parties to be immediately proceeded against, while the Government find that such haste would be very inconvenient to the administration. As we pointed out last week, in a case like this the Government know best when and how to deal with the parties in question. This is evidently the opinion of the majority of the High Court Judges, including the Chief Justice. With a Judicial Member of Council like Sir Raymond West, we can afford to wait till such time as Government is free to act in the matter without prejudice to any of the public interests involved. In the meantime, we know not if the officials compromised are left in a position to abuse their office.

Alleged sale of offices of Deputy Collectors, &c., in the Central Division, Bombay Presidency.

11. The Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 9th February, says:—It is said that from inquiries made by the Crawford Commission it has been established that in the Central Division for several years past the posts of Deputy Collectors, Mámlatdárs, Magistrates, &c., were offered for sale and were obtained by those who could pay for them. Though this state of things has come to light in regard to one Division only, it cannot be said that it has been confined to that Division alone. Private rumours have been pointing out other Divisions also as suffering from several evils, and though these rumours have not hitherto been credited, they ought to be differently treated after the exposures concerning the Central Division.

Remarks in connection with the rules sanctioned by the Bombay Government in connection with the marriage expenses among the Lewa Kunbi caste in the Kaira District.

12. The Suryodayă (64), in its issue of the 4th February, says that at the suggestion of the Government of India the Bombay Government have sanctioned certain rules restricting the marriage expenses among the Lewa Kunbi caste in the Kaira District, and remarks that now that the Government have commenced to interfere with the social matters of the Hindus, they will bye and bye fix the time for the consummation of marriages too among them.

13. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 3rd February, writes :—The power of conferring posts in the Government service is an important one, and whoever abuses it in any way ought to be exposed. The Amrit Bazar Patrika exposed the growth of nepotism in the Postal Department. But it seems that our contemporary's disclosures had no effect so far as the practice was concerned. The Morning Post gives a long list of the relatives of Mr. Sheridan, Inspector-General of the Railway Mail Service and Deputy Director-General of the Post Offices in India, who number 9 in all and draw between them Rs. 3,000 and more. Besides their salaries most of these have free houses or special and other allowances. Now one may ask if this be not the grossest piece of abuse of patronage on the part of a Government official. It is a pity that Government allows such scandals, not only to exist, but to be propagated. It is impossible that such facts can remain in the dark from Government Secretariat officers, but race partiality blinds them all and the scandal is connived at. There is hardly any difference between an officer selling high offices to the highest bidder and one who dispenses his patronage on the principle that "charity begins at home."

Mr. Caine's address on the temperance question.

14. In expressing approval of most of the opinions and recommendations made by Mr. Caine, M. P., in his address on the drink question, attacking the excise system, delivered in the Framji Cowasji Institute, Bombay, a day previous to his departure for England, the Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 9th February, says ;—Mr. Caine's recommendation that the present system of liquor-farming should be done away with by Government taking into their own hands the manufacture and sale of liquor is not appropriate, for in these days of financial stress it is not likely to be accepted by Government and it is wrong in principle that the State should take up commercial concerns. The best course is that the state of things prior to the ábkári enactments should be restored, as it never gave rise to any complaints from the public. Before appointing the commission recommended by Mr. Caine for the final settlement of the ábkári question, opinions of able and experienced persons should be obtained on the subject of the improvement of the present system and they should be placed before the commission. [The Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the same date, expresses similar sentiments.]

The sentence passed by Mr. Robertson, Assistant Collector, Surat, on Mr. Clifford, and a suggestion to the Bombay High Court in the matter.

15. A correspondent of the Gujaráti (78), in its issue of the 3rd February, writes :—The case of Mr. F. Clifford is not quite unknown to many of your readers, and I am sorry the way in which Mr. Robertson, Assistant Collector, Surat, has decided it will again bring this dirty affair to the foreground. It may be well to reproduce some of the incidents of the case. One Dhania Keshav, in the service of a toddy-seller at Mora in the Olpád Táluka, Surat, was unlawfully detained in custody for 24 hours and the complaint was first heard by Mr. Moore, who dismissed the case. The case then came on before the Bombay High Court, which in the exercise of its revisional powers ordered the Magistrate to inquire further into the case. At this stage the case was heard by Mr. Robertson, who convicted Mr. Clifford under Section 342 of the Penal Code and sentenced him to pay the heavy fine of four annas. People are already oppressed with ábkári zulum and here is a fresh encouragement to the ábkári authorities from a tribunal of justice. I do not understand what nice considerations induced Mr. Robertson to fix the fine precisely at four annas and not at four pies. If the case was a very weak one and if there was no sufficient evidence, Mr. Clifford should have been acquitted, and then the public would have had no occasion to complain as at present. If I mistake not, it was the same Assistant Collector who inflicted heavy fines from Rs. 15 to Rs. 20 and more on owners of cattle worth Rs. 10 or 12 under the "Stray Cattle Act," and when the cases came on for revision before the Bombay High Court, in many instances the fines were reduced. I trust that the Bombay High Court will again call for the record and proceedings of the case and pass an adequate sentence on the accused, which alone will satisfy the ends of justice.

16. The Gujarát Darpan (76), in its issue of the 3rd February, writes:— The case of Dhania v. Clifford should open the eyes of Government to the real situation of affairs in the mofussil. It is not the stringent ábkári rules which grind down poor people, but there are ábkári officers, who become a ceaseless source of trouble and annoyance to them. Here is an instance of an official who on the merest suspicion laid hold of a poor coolie and summarily executed him under lynch-law. Dhania may be a poor man in the sight of Mr. Clifford, but not in the sight of law. He was wrongfully confined for 24 hours, and he therefore asked for redress of his grievance. But he had to undergo a deal of trouble and expense before his wrong could be righted. This is the only case which has been successfully brought to the surface, but we leave to our readers to think how many of them are either hushed up or are not brought to the notice of the authorities. The sooner this mischief is arrested the better. [The Suryá Prakásh (85), in its issue of the 2nd February, says that the punishment of a trivial fine of 4 annas imposed upon Mr. Clifford, A'bkári Inspector, Surat, by Mr. Robertson, is not creditable to the British administration of justice, and that it remains to be seen what steps the Bombay High Court takes in the matter.]

Abolition of the Court of Assistant to the Subordinate Judge, 1st Class, at Ahmedabad, suggested.

17. The Nyáyadarshak (119), in its issue of the 4th February, praises Ráo Bahádur Chunilál, Subordinate Judge, 1st Class, at Ahmedabad, for his satisfactory despatch of work, says that the people of Ahmedabad are pleased with his impartial administration of justice and cool temper, that no necessity whatever now exists for the maintenance of the Court of his Assistant, and that its abolition will cause a saving of from seven to eight thousand rupees per annum and will afford great convenience to suitors and vakils, and requests the Bombay Government to attend to this suggestion.

The acquittal of Private Swift of culpable man-slaughter by the Bombay High Court.

18. In noticing the acquittal of Private Swift of the charge of committing culpable homicide at a village in the Ahmednagar District, at the last criminal sessions of the Bombay High Court, the Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 6th February, says:—It has become a frequent occurrence that British soldiers or other Europeans accused of culpable homicide of Natives are acquitted by a jury of Europeans, and the case of Private Swift is of the same nature. As in other cases, Private Swift brought forward the defence that the unfortunate occurrence took place by simple accident. It is a striking point that such grave accidents should occur often in all parts of the country at the hands of Europeans, while none should take place at the hands of Natives, who, like Europeans, go on hunting excursions. The explanation is that Europeans are mischievous and arrogant and do not care for the life of a villager, who is looked upon as one of the lower animals. They soon get excited and make use of their weapons on a dispute arising between them and the villagers. This conduct of European sportsmen is encouraged to a certain extent by the ease with which they escape or receive only slight punishment at the hands of European juries for the serious offence of man-slaughter. This state of things is much to be deplored and ought to be removed by severely punishing the offenders and by taking strict precautions against allowing British soldiers to go armed beyond camp limits. [The Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 5th February, expresses regret that the jury did not weigh the evidence carefully, but acquitted the accused, and hopes that British soldiers will not be allowed to go on hunting excursions without proper precautions.]

Complaint against the selection of jurors, Broach Sessions Court.

19. The Anonymous (89), in its issue of the 3rd February, refers to the nomination of Messrs. Greaves, Wilson and four other European gentlemen as jurors, Broach Sessions Court, expresses surprise at the jurors being only Europeans, and asks whether Government have resolved to appoint Europeans alone as jurors.

Alleged unjust order issued by an Assistant Collector of the Kaira District.

20. The Kaira Vartamán (110), in its issue of the 6th February, says:—There have been short crops this year on account of insufficient rain, and the rayats are suffering from want of food. Mr. K. R. Bomanji, Assistant Collector, Kaira, has, however, issued orders that the patels of such villages of the Kapadvanj and Thásra tálukas of the Kaira District as owe arrears of land revenue should be suspended from their office and double the amount of their pay for the period of suspension should be recovered from their salaries. It is evidently not right to punish the patel because the farmers cannot or would not pay, and this injustice ought to be rectified by the Collector of the district.

Harsh rules made by the Collector of the Kolába District in the matter of land revenue remissions in that district.

21. The Poona Vaibhav (49), in its issue of the 3rd February, publishes a letter written by a correspondent from Roha in the Kolába District, in which the writer states from hearsay the circumstances under which alone the District Collector has authorized the village and táluka officers to recommend remissions of land revenue, and in commenting upon the instructions issued by the Collector the paper expresses its opinion that they are very harsh and all but useless, and that they are such as would lead people who were not tame like the natives of India to suck the blood off the throat of their framer.

Grievances of passengers by coasting steamers plying between Bombay and Goa.

22. The Satyá Shodhak (58), in its issue of the 3rd February, refers to the memorial forwarded to Government by some people in Bombay about the grievances of passengers by coasting steamers plying between Bombay and Goa, approves of the suggestions made therein, and says that the grievances are of long standing and affect thousands of people, that they have remained unattended to by Messrs. Shepherd and Company although they have been frequently brought to their notice, and that therefore Government should now take a decisive action in the matter. [The Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 7th February, says that of late instances of accidents to coasting steamers have been so numerous that Government can no longer connive at them and that it has received many complaints regarding the ill-treatment of passengers on board these steamers, and recommends the people in the Konkan to send petitions after petitions to Government until the inconveniences complained of by them are removed.]

Remarks on the conduct of Mr. Keyser, Collector of Sátára.

23. The Pratod (52), in its issue of the 4th February, says that as at the appearance of a lion other wild beasts hide themselves through fear, so the clerks in the revenue offices in the tálukas are frightened when they hear of the approach of Mr. Keyser, Collector of Sátára, that during his last visit to Tásgaon and Islámpur he inflicted fines and gave Irish promotion to some of the clerks there, that these punishments are quite out of proportion to their offences which were very trifling, that although it is true that Mr. Keyser never carries out the threats held out by him when he loses his temper, and although he is both active and intelligent, the good effects of these qualities are a little marred by his irritable disposition, and hopes that he will remove the latter defect and make himself agreeable in every way.

Prosecution of Ráo Sáheb Sháháne, a Mámlatdár, and the Collector of Khándesh.

24. Referring to the acquittal by the Sessions Court in Khándesh of Ráo Sáheb Pralhád Krishna Sháháne, a Mámlatdár, of the charges of bribery brought against him, and to the opinion of the Sessions Judge that the case for the prosecution was a got up one, the A'ryávart (21), in its issue of the 3rd February, censures the conduct of the District Collector in permitting the prosecution of Mr. Sháháne on the complaint of an individual who had no reputation to lose. It adds that the Collector ought to have taken into consideration Mr. Sháháne's spotless and long service and the fact that he was once appointed on special duty in that district, before sanctioning his prosecution.

Complaints against Mr. Ingle, Huzur Deputy Collector, Kánara.

25. The Havyak Subhodh (143), in its issue of the 5th February, writes:— The main reason why the district of Kánara is in a backward state is that Government do not pay as much attention to it as they do to other districts. A great many unjust acts are done and hidden by the officials. We would not have minded them if they had been of rare occurrence. The officers in Kánara, like big tigers devouring every animal that comes in their way, venture to act unjustly even towards the Supreme Government. In giving contracts of the ferry boats at the villages of Divige and Manike at one and the same rate contrary to Government orders, which direct that the contract of Divige boats should be given at second-class rates and that of the Manike boats at the third-class rate, the officers did not only cause loss of income to the Government, but deceived it. The contractor of the boats was supported by the officers in his illegal levy of fares. Everybody will be astonished to see an officer of Mr. Ingle's position, who has been serving in the Kánara District for the last 25 years, going against the rules laid down by the Government in regard to the contracts of the ferry boats. This thing ought to have been brought to the notice of Government at least by Mr. Lakshman Krishna, the then Local Fund clerk, or by Ráo Sáheb Lakshman Mangesh, the Mámlatdár of Kumta. Leaving aside all the men who were concerned in this, the present acting clerk, Mr. Andru Saldana, a Christian, has been transferred. We give one more example of Mr. Ingle's not paying proper attention to his duties and thereby inflicting loss of money upon Government. Government have kept two small boats in Kánara at their own cost and have ruled that when their officers travel in those boats they should not be allowed to draw mileage allowance. Contrary to this rule Mr. Ingle passed the mileage bills preferred by the Civil Surgeon and some other officers who had travelled in the Government boats. The high officers in this district earn money unfairly when they breathe the air of this place. It will be a spot on the fame of Government if they let such things remain as they are. Mr. Ingle had finished his term of service entitling him to pension two years ago, but he has been getting extension every year through the recommendation of the Collector. Government have never shown such partiality to any other officer in this presidency. He has been allowed to remain in one and the same district for 25 years. We have also heard that Mr. Ingle, who is a dear friend of a Secretary to Government, is trying to remain in the service for some time more in the same post. Though he is an experienced and intelligent officer, still his old age has changed his disposition. If he be allowed to continue in the service, people will think that Government are doing an overt act of injustice.

Injustice done to Mr. Kále, Deputy Accountant, Dhárwár, by the Commissioner, S. D.

26. The Dhárwár Vritt (27), in its issue of the 7th February, says that great injustice has been done to the claims of Mr. Dinkar Govind Kále, Deputy Accountant, Dhárwár, in giving the place of Head Accountant at Ratnágiri to Mr. Fulmandikar, Deputy Accountant at Sholápur, who was in receipt of less salary than Mr. Kále, has served under the latter when he was Acting Head Accountant at Sholápur, and has not like Mr. Kále passed the Lower Standard Examination. If these places, the paper adds, are to be conferred on one's favourites in disregard of the claims of others, it is better that the rules laid down by Government on the subject should be cancelled so that newspapers may not have any ground to complain. The present Commissioner, S. D., is a considerate man and so it is not desirable to strongly criticise his conduct in one or two instances.

PART II.—Legislation.

Extension of the English Factory Act to India strongly disapproved.

27. The Rást Goftár (83), in its issue of the 3rd February, writes:—The Bombay Chamber of Commerce, as appears from the published report of their meeting held this week, had no very big questions last year to occupy them. But their committee can claim to have done a large amount of useful work in connection with various questions of mercantile importance. The remarks of the chairman on the selfish agitation started in Lancashire, with the object of hampering the cotton industry of Bombay, was the special occasion which drew from Mr. Cotton the compliment that the Bombay Chamber was free from the weakness, to be noticed in some similar bodies elsewhere, of taking a narrow and selfish view of questions affecting their own interests. Mr. Adam repeats what has been already said in these columns that the transparent hypocrisy of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce cannot impose upon the Government. It was, however, none the less necessary on the part of the Bombay Mill-owners' Association to have mercilessly exposed the motives underlying that movement. We hope that Manchester merchants will, for very shame, desist from playing the rôle of philanthropists, especially as they must have seen, as business men, that the mask can scarcely deceive even the most credulous. According to Mr. Cotton, Lancashire has more or less an imaginary grievance, so far as our trade with China is concerned. The Bombay importers of Manchester goods, on the other hand, are the real sufferers, because the article is supplied to the country by the mills on the spot. It is therefore all the more creditable to the Bombay Chamber that the personal interests of some of its members are not allowed to blind their sense of justice. We have said that the action of the mill-owners of Bombay was not a waste of energy on their part, for we cannot say what pressure Lancashire might yet succeed in bringing to bear on one or the other of the great political parties in England. Lord Cross declared in a speech at Oldham that he expected that an alteration would shortly be made in the Factory Acts in India. There is no reason why the Secretary of State for India should have gone to the great manufacturing town to give that assurance. If the announcement is intended as a tiding of joy for the British manufacturers, it bodes no good to the cotton industry of India. We do need factory legislation, but certainly not on the lines indicated by Manchester. We want to encourage and protect the industry, and not to hamper and cripple it. Manchester is, indeed, extremely kind to our work-people, but it is a kindness that kills. [A few other papers take the same view as regards the expected alteration in the Indian Factory Acts to which Lord Cross, Secretary of State for India, alluded in his recent speech at Oldham. The Gujarát Mitră (79), in its issue of the 3rd February, remarks that His Excellency Lord Lansdowne should strenuously oppose the expected alteration in the Indian Factory Acts in case it be likely to kill the Indian mill industry, and that His Excellency should bring the Secretary of State for India to his senses even if he have to resign the Viceroyalty of India in so doing, and requests Lord Cross to abstain from the work. The Gujaráti (78), in its issue of the 3rd February, observes that the effort made by Manchester in this matter is selfish, and that it is a great blemish in the Indian Government that Manchester should have the power to have Indian laws altered and that India should quietly keep looking on, asks where the so-called honesty of the British Government, which is falsely praised in Indian histories issued by them, has gone, and adds that though Native youths may perhaps be deceived by this false praise, grown up Natives will not be so deceived, and that the Secretary of State for India should well bear in mind that he is incurring great reproach in yielding to the wishes of the people of Manchester and thereby ruining the Indian mill industry.]

Metal Tokens Act approved.

28. The Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 4th February, expresses approval of the enactment of the Metal Tokens Bill, observing that the evil caused by permitting the circulation of old coins is not so serious as to be put a stop to at once at the sacrifices alluded to at the discussion of the Bill in the Viceregal Council, and that the Government of India have done well in taking the middle course of curing the evil gradually by passing a law to that effect.

Comments on the Bombay Village Sanitation Bill.

29. The Kesari (39), in its issue of the 5th February, says that the proposed Bombay Village Sanitation Bill is a very important measure, but does not approve of the appointment of committees by officers to look to the sanitation of villages, and observes that the committees should be formed after the panchâyat system, as otherwise they might injure the cause of local self-government and become a source of annoyance to the villagers.

PART III.—Education.

The Poona Sárvajanik Sabha and the present educational policy of the Bombay Government.

30. The following is an extract, paragraph 4, of the address presented by the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha to the Honourable W. S. Caine, M. P., published in the Mahrátta (2) of the 3rd February:—The changes which the Government of India have recently recommended to Local Governments with regard to higher and secondary education have filled the public mind with great uneasiness. The educational policy on which the Bombay Government in particular have recently embarked has exercised the public of this presidency to a most acute degree. The Government of Bombay contemplate the raising of the already high rates of fees in high schools and colleges all over. The result will be to make higher and secondary education an article of luxury, available only to the rich few. Already the Government have thrown a large share of the burden of the expenditure on primary education on municipalities, and if they now throw the responsibility of giving secondary and higher education off their shoulders, they would be practically contributing almost nothing to the education of the people. The result of such a disastrous policy can be easily foreseen. The educated Natives of this country are the staunchest supporters of British rule, because they appreciate its blessings best. If then the educating forces in the country are crippled, serious mischief would ensue to the Empire. The best interests of England and India alike, therefore, demand that the expenditure of Government on education, if not increased, should remain at least what it is. The best course in our opinion to secure this would be a resolution carried in the two Houses of the British Parliament that a fixed percentage of the revenues of India should be spent on the education of the people. The hands of the Indian Government will thus be tied, and it will then be impossible for them to think of cutting down the educational grant and a grave national danger will thus be averted.

Comments on the present educational policy of the Bombay Government.

31. The Sudhárak (17), in its issue of the 4th February, quotes the resolution of the Bombay Government, dated 19th January last, in reply to the representations of the people of Ahmednagar against the proposed abolition of the Nagar High School, and says:—It is a pity that the policy of the Government should change with every fresh gale, and that a question which has been acutely exercising the public mind for a considerably long time should not be definitely decided one way or the other. We are quite sure that Government does not understand its own mind on the subject. On no other hypothesis is it possible to explain all this vacillation, which is now exciting so much disgust in the public mind. For example, the resolution says that it is not the policy of Government to throw the expenses of higher education on municipal funds. If so, what did the Government mean by calling upon the municipalities of all important district towns, only a short time ago, to contribute towards making with the fee-receipts two-thirds of the total expenditure on the high schools within their several jurisdictions? Then again, about a month ago, His Excellency Lord Reay assured the people of the presidency, while speaking at Kárwár, that there was no intention on the part of Government of closing Ahmednagar and Ratnágiri high schools as Government institutions. The resolution, however, tells us that Ahmednagar is a centre of less importance;

therefore Government would maintain the high school there as its own institution, if the inhabitants of that place are willing to make efforts to enable Government to make up the deficiency in school receipts. If the people show no disposition in this direction by the 15th instant, Government will negotiate for the transfer of the high school to a local educational body. How Lord Reay can find it in his heart to reconcile these two positions we do not know. An eminent educationist as he is, we are constrained to say his Government is pursuing a most disastrous educational policy,—its bad nature made worse by the spirit of vacillation and timidity which is being betrayed at every turn. It is said that the fees of the Poona High School are to be raised to Rs. 6 per boy. It is unnecessary to say that this will have almost the practical effect of closing it. It is also unnecessary for us to say that when the policy stated in the resolution is carried out, the greatest blow will be given to the progress of the people of this presidency, and the interests of the Empire will receive a rude shock. But if it is unfortunate that the Government policy is drifting in a deplorable direction, doubly unfortunate it is that our people should tamely accept as inevitable whatever the Government, in its blindness, is deciding on. This is indeed one of those occasions when the whole presidency ought to be "swept" by an agitation, determined and fearless. Every town and every village ought to ring with a denunciation of the proposed educational policy of the Government and most numerously signed protests ought to go up to the Local and the Supreme Governments. If the agitation becomes as strong as it ought to, we venture to think that Government will give up the proposed unfortunate policy. He who will take upon himself the task of organizing such an agitation will surely render a lasting service to the people of this presidency. But the disheartening question rises to the lips—"Where are we to look for a man worthy of the task?"

32. The Subodh Patrika (16), in its issue of the 3rd February, also disapproves of the present educational policy of the Bombay Government as being unworthy, and says that in discouraging secondary education the Government is actuated by economy and a desire of checking the progressive spirit of the people manifested in the establishment of a National Congress and similar other institutions, and that the descendants of those brave A'ryans who spread their fame to the utmost limits of India and established their empire in that vast continent will not fail in course of time to spread education throughout the country. Ignorance is not so conducive, adds the paper, to the peace of the country as knowledge is, and it is the duty of the leaders of society to shake off their lethargy and to exert themselves for the enlightenment of their people without depending for it upon Government, but standing upon their own legs.

33. The Jagadádarsh (34), in its issue of the 3rd February, entirely disapproves of the recent resolution issued by the Government of His Excellency Lord Reay in the matter of the high schools in the Bombay Presidency, considers it unworthy of a civilized Government like the British, and particularly of a Government headed by a reputed educationist like His Excellency Lord Reay, expresses distrust in the word of Government as the resolution in question has come so soon after the disavowal of a desire to abolish the high schools at Ahmednagar and Ratnágiri declared by His Excellency the Governor in his public speech at Kárwár, and suggests to the people of Ahmednagar the advisability of making an appeal on the subject of their high school to His Excellency Lord Lansdowne, who at the last Convocation of the Calcutta University said that the cause of education would not suffer during his tenure of office as Viceroy of India.

34. Writing on the same subject, the Kesari (39), in its issue of the 5th February, says:—God knows how much burden Government intend to throw upon the people. His Excellency Lord Reay recently said that municipalities would not be asked to pay any share of the expenditure on high schools. Government need not boast of this declaration; for, they are already aware that the municipalities find it very difficult to defray the expenses of primary education. We should have considered it a favour if Government had said that not only the municipalities, but even the people, will not have to bear any burden of the expenditure on high schools. But considering their policy with regard to the Ahmednagar High School they do not seem to be so liberal. Mere disapproval of the present educational policy of Government is of no use. The people should hold an educational conference and decide whether they should or should not prepare themselves to assist Government in the matter.

35. The Poona Vaibhav (49), in its issue of the 3rd February, says that from their present attitude of stinginess towards their own high schools it appears that Government intend discontinuing grants-in-aid to private English schools, and advises the proprietors of the New English School, Poona, to extend the sphere of their usefulness by establishing an educational department of their own throughout the Bombay Presidency in accordance with the object of the late Vishnu Krishna Shástri, the founder of that school.

Disapproval of the proposed increase in fees in the high schools in Sind.

36. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 30th January, writes:—Unjustifiable as the policy of raising school-fees is in respect to the presidency proper, it is more so in regard to Sind, than which no part of the presidency is more backward in all things, including matters educational. Within the last six years fees have been nearly doubled, and the present deplorable state of the Hyderabad High School, for instance, shows what fruits the Government policy is already bearing. About three years back, when the fees were raised in that school, the number of scholars steadily decreased and we thought that the educational authorities would see the mistake of their policy, and by reversing the order enhancing the fees repair the incalculable mischief that had been done to the cause of education. Instead of openly closing the schools as it was at first threatened, Government perhaps thought it wise to adopt a policy which must inevitably result in the utter depopulation of the schools,—a consummation which we are constrained to surmise Government ultimately wish to bring about. No economy can be effected in the Educational Department without doing some mischief, but as retrenchment must be effected, we think that it should be done by reducing the pay of head-masters rather than by raising the fees. The head-master of the Shikárpur High School, where the number of scholars has been fixed at about 330,—considerably larger than in the Hyderabad High School,—gets only Rs. 200 per mensem, and we do not think that if the Hyderabad pay is also brought down to that level, anybody will have a reasonable grievance against the Government. Another item of expenditure where Government may well effect economy is the contingent expenses of the several schools. Compared to the evil that must be wrought by the raising of fees, these reductions will be productive of little harm.

Complaint regarding the prevalence of mismanagement in the Rájkumár College, Rájkot.

37. The Rájyabhakt (124), in its issue of the 5th February, complains of the prevalence of mismanagement in the Rájkumár College, Rájkot, of Mr. Macnaghten, the Principal of the College, having made the students under him to contribute towards the cost of a golden chain of the value of about Rs. 450 presented by him to Miss Hancock on the occasion of her marriage with Mr. Salmon, of the Principal and the Vice-Principal, Mr. Tarkhad, having spent their vacation holidays in some of the Native States that had their Princes studying in the College and of the want of rules for its management, points out the necessity for a change in the members composing the committee of supervision and of the powers enjoyed by the Principal in regard to the detention of students and the permission to them to leave the institution, and remarks that the College staff is inefficient and that until Messrs. Macnaghten and Tarkhad are transferred from it no solid good can result.

The Bombay University and the alleged grounds for suspicions about the management of its affairs.

38. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 4th February, says:—Both of the candidates declared in the last Tuesday's Bombay Government Gazette to have passed the First B.A. Examination of the Bombay University belong to the Free Church College. The question asked by the people in this respect is, if the meeting of the examiners was dissolved long ago, by whom were these two candidates declared to have passed the examination? Were the papers of these two candidates alone re-examined? And if so, why were they re-examined and why were not those of others also re-examined? It is much to be regretted that such things should give ground for many suspicions. In order to avoid all this we suggest that candidates should be shown their answer papers on payment of a small fee. This will keep a check on the examiners and remove the impression on the public mind that University affairs are mismanaged. The arrangements should be such that the people will never think that the Bombay University examinations are so many lotteries, that everything depends on luck, and that intrigues play an important part in them.

The abolition of the oral in the Matriculation Examination of the Bombay University disapproved.

39. The same newspaper writes:—The abolition of the English oral in the Matriculation Examination is an event which we cannot look upon without the greatest misgivings. We are conscious of the evils of the divergence of standards of different examiners and the inconvenience and expense to the candidates as well as to the University which the oral examination of so large a number as now presents itself at the Matriculation involves. But with all due deference to the superior wisdom of the Senate, we think that the removal of the oral will greatly impair the efficiency of the examination. It was the only effective opportunity of bringing the candidate into personal contact with the examiner, and of testing his English pronunciations and reading, his presence of mind and his general smartness. The oral examination is some guarantee against fraud of one candidate personating another. In our opinion it should not be dispensed with unless some other mode of bringing the candidates and examiners face to face could be substituted.

Moral education to school-going children and the step taken by the head-master of one of the high schools in Sind.

40. A correspondent, writing to the Phœnix (3) in its issue of the 2nd February, says:—Very recently the head-master of one of the high schools in Sind has with the best of intentions, no doubt, thought it desirable to give moral teaching to his pupils and has been unfortunately unable to find any suitable books for the purpose except the Mission school series. These are admirable in themselves, but they contain, as they needs must, lessons on Christianity and other religions. They teach that Christianity is the only religion suited for mankind and that Hinduism and Mahomedanism ought to be rejected by every man wishing for salvation. The latter two religions are condemned in very strong language, while the former is held up as the only religion sanctioned by God. When these books were first introduced into a particular school, signs of discontent began to show themselves. I, however, thought that the good sense of the head-master, who shall be nameless for the present, would suggest to him the necessity for omitting in the course of his teaching the books at least such lessons or portions of them as inculcate Christianity and condemn other religions. But experience shows that I was mistaken.

Want of feeding schools to the Victoria Technical Institute, Bombay.

41. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 4th February, writes:—His Excellency Lord Reay paid a handsome compliment to Father Page of the St. Peter's Schools, Bombay, and his colleagues. He described the progress of the schools as one of leaps and bounds and claimed for Government a no small share of liberality in the increasing grants year after year. In reference to Father Page's regret at the ill success of the schools at the Matriculation and his promise "to aim higher in order to do better," Lord Reay's advice is to aim differently and prepare pupils for the University School Final Examination. In reference to the need of a technical branch to the schools, he advised the school managers to avail themselves of the facilities of the Victoria Technical Institute, Bombay. The Institute, it is to be noted, has already out-grown its capacities. We know of students who have been refused admittance for want of accommodation. To refer every aspirant for technical education to the Institute is an idle makeshift. Either the Institute must be strengthened or some branch schools opened as feeders, making the Institute a superior collegiate institution. At the very opening of the Institute the Committee found the number of applicants for admission in excess of the provision they had at their command,—a fact which shows that there is a real demand for technical education. Lord Reay is not a little responsible for stimulating this demand, as His Lordship has been constantly preaching on the benefits of that education. It will behove His Lordship, therefore, to make an adequate provision for satisfying that demand. Unless the Educational Department takes up the matter and starts schools all over the presidency, the demand can scarcely be satisfied.

Remarks on the alleged buying and selling of votes at the last general elections in Bombay.

42. A correspondent of the Rást Goftár (83), in its issue of the 3rd February, writes:—What do you say as to the desirability of having here a bribery and corruption Bill, somewhat on the lines of the measure enacted by Parliament to control the elections in Great Britain? The time is certainly not yet ripe for it, but if what I have heard from reliable sources about the buying and selling of votes at the last municipal elections in Bombay be true, a day may yet come for the introduction of such a Bill in our Legislative Council. A Hindu elector came to my informant at one of the polling booths—I will not particularize the ward—and offered to sell his last remaining vote for Rs. 5. I have heard that one or two candidates were not deterred by the scruples of conscience from purchasing votes. I think that it is the duty of all honest men to see that the evil is nipped in the bud; otherwise the Government will have recourse to legislation, which will not redound to the credit of local self-government in Bombay.

PART V.—Native States.

Remarks on the state of affairs in the Indore State.

43. The Vártáhar (19), in its issue of the 3rd February, refers to the dispute existing between His Highness the Mahárája Holkar and his aged mother about the latter's private property, to the suit filed by a merchant in Poona against one of the servants of His Highness for the recovery of some ornaments which he had taken for His Highness' selection and to the theft of jewellery from His Highness' palace at Indore by one Atmárám Anant, who has implicated some Darbár officials in the committal of the theft in his deposition before the Railway Police officer by whom he was arrested, and observes that from the above facts and from the conduct of His Highness no one can say that the state of affairs in the Indore State is statisfactory, and recommends the Mahárája to improve it before it is too late to do so.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Part I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

The present situation of India and its similarity with that of Ireland.

1. A London correspondent of the Gujarát Gazette (77), in its issue of the 14th February, writes:—I desire to clear up some misconception which seems to prevail in India with some minds, carried away either by views of extreme loyalty or misled by selfishness or stupidity. A few Indian newspapers, absorbed in intense egotism, flatter themselves with making out a position that the present Indian situation has no similarity with the Irish one. If the English patronage in Ireland has sapped the vitality of that country, the very same patronage in India produces the very same effects in no less remarkable a degree. The case is rather stronger with India. Her wrongs in this direction far outweigh Ireland's; India with her dullness of intellect is unable to cope with the grasping demands of the sons of England, which Ireland has to a great extent succeeded in repelling, subduing and reducing with her more enlightened claims. But officialism and its arrogance, and unrestricted patronage are the natural and probable incidents of all foreign rule; and so long as that foreign-rule is not converted into or assimilated to Home Rule, the grievance must remain unredressed and foreign rule abused. If Ireland succeeds in getting Home Rule, we shall succeed in getting one like it, one conducted on its lines as much as possible, one which combines the neutrality of a foreign rule with the economy of Home Rule. Here then there is a sisterhood between Ireland and India. There is a oneness in their aspirations. It is not for nothing that the Honourable Dádábhái Navroji poses as a Home Ruler for Ireland. It is because he knows, sees, and feels, but abstains from proclaiming wisely or unwisely, the homogeneity of the claims of both countries. He has pointed out boldly and like a true patriot, as he is, that no Government in India, however benevolent it may be, can be good so long as it is not conducted on the lines of native rule. What does this mean? By the life of me! I see no distinction between Home Rule and native rule. Home Rule need not be a rule by Parliaments. It is identical with native rule. If the Honourable gentleman has the happy prevision of a Home Rule for India in a not very distant future, but with his studied sagacity refrains from holding it out as a present remedy for Indian grievances, it is because he is afraid of frightening some of India's best friends into turning their backs upon the miserable poverty-ridden country, because he fancies that the demand for Home Rule which he calls native rule might throw the sensitive Anglo-Indians into hysterics which are likely to outlast their wisdom, and because he fancies the hysterics might do his beloved country irreparable harm which he wishes to spare her at all hazards. I hope I have sufficiently shown that both India and Ireland have been afflicted with the same desire which necessitates a similar remedy for its extermination. When Mr. O'Brien or any one of his Irish colleagues calls upon India to make common cause with Ireland, and the newspaper writers of India repudiate his advocacy, we can understand that the Irishman with his exaggerated advocacy is more right than his clients who disown him because they are suffering from the fatal indisposition known to politicians as moral timidity, or that they are actuated by motives of self-aggrandizement at the expense of the nation; or that they little know the history of the country about which they affect to write with apparent sincerity or that they are victims to selfishness, timidity, ignorance, and stupidity all combined. On no other ground can I understand the position of those who extol the Honourable Dádábhái Navroji, while they abuse and scoff at a patriot whose patriotism is beyond all praise and whose intelligence is immensely ahead of the intelligence of some of the native journalists who are not worth the sole of his boots.

India's wailings about her alleged ill-treatment by her British masters.

2. The Kâthiáwádi (81), in its issue of the 12th February, writes:—India weeps! There are many to wipe off her tears, but there is not one in a thousand to sincerely support and help her. This is India's misfortune. Twenty-five krors of her unfortunate and destitute children weep day and night for a piece of bread, but Britons intoxicated with the pride of riches, learning, &c., pay no heed to it and turn a deaf ear to it. This is India's misfortune. India weeps and krors of her weak and meek children most helplessly entreat Britannia's sons for mercy, but these hard-hearted men do not show it to them. This is India's misfortune. Injustice is done to her ignorant children, the innocent are found guilty, while the guilty are let off through influence, and great distinction is observed between black and white skin. Can anything be more unfortunate for India? Injustice is done in broad day-light to India and to her dear and innocent children. European huntsmen kill several innocent Indians like dogs, and the modesty of their wives and daughters is outraged in numerous ways, but nothing is done to stop it. The British authorities are blind though they have eyes. Favouritism and influence are rampant. This is India's misfortune. Hind, how much shall we mourn for you? Our heart breaks, we are pained at heart and die without cause! Alas!

Want of unity among the people of India.

3. The Kalpataru (36), in its issue of the 10th February, says that India is under a foreign rule and has been reduced to poverty not because the people have no courage or intelligence but because there is no unity among them, that a reference to history will show that under the leadership of Shiváji the illiterate Mávlás performed great exploits and overthrew the Moghal empire simply by the force of unity, and that it is therefore necessary for the people of India to regain the unity which once existed among them and for want of which the native rulers have lost their kingdoms and have had to wander all over the country.

The Indian National Congress and the attempts of Europeans in India to obstruct its growth.

4. The Vengurla Vritt (65), in its issue of the 7th February, says that the Europeans in India being afraid of the increasing power of the Indian National Congress privately determined to obstruct its growth, and with a view to strike at the root of that political body, circulars were issued recommending the abolition of the Government high schools or the raising of the fees in them. The opponents of the Congress, the paper continues, are well aware of the political spirit which has been awakened in the minds of the people of India, and if they at all desire to turn it to good account, they should abandon their policy of withholding education from the people and should bear in mind that truth will always triumph.

Sanction alleged to have been given by the Secretary of State for India for payment of the costs incurred by Mr. Wilson in the Cambay case.

5. In alluding to a report that the Secretary of State for India has sanctioned the payment of the costs incurred by Mr. Wilson in defending himself against the accusations preferred against him in the Cambay case, the Bombay Samáchar (92), in its issue of the 14th February, says:—The public was surprized at the exculpation of Mr. Wilson by Lord Cross, and is amazed to see that Mr. Wilson is to be presented with nine thousand rupees as costs of his defence. The Secretary of State has sanctioned the amount under the impression that Mr. Wilson being innocent and injured, ought not to be made to bear the costs of his defence. But why should the Indian treasury bear the burden? The proper course for Mr. Wilson would have been to take legal steps against his prosecutor for the recovery of the costs.

Reported finding of the Crawford Commission in favour of the accused in regard to the charges of corruption.

6. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 11th February, writes:—It is difficult to say how far the public must believe the various reports which have been afloat as to the report of the Crawford Commission. It is said, on what is alleged to be reliable authority, that the Commission has acquitted Mr. Crawford of all the charges of bribery and found him guilty on some of the charges of improper borrowing within his jurisdiction. Another report goes to the effect that the Commission has not honourably acquitted Mr. Crawford of the charges of corruption but simply held that the evidence was not conclusive enough to justify a verdict of guilty. A third report is that only one of the Commissioners is for acquitting Mr. Crawford of corruption while the other two find him guilty. Nothing definite and reliable can be known until the report is given out. The Government of Bombay are now considering the report of the Commissioners, and since the Act under which the Commission was appointed gives the Government the right to have their say on the points which the Commission had to enquire into and to consider, it is not easy to see with what reason any one can demand as a matter of right that the Commissioners' report should instantly be made public and that a copy of it should be given to Mr. Crawford. The Government of Bombay have had many hard things said of them by certain writers in the press for the attempt they have made to enquire into what was alleged to be a grave scandal. It seems to us that the Government will not fear to discharge conscientiously the duty they have courageously undertaken in the matter. His Excellency Lord Reay has moved with a courage which reflects the highest credit on him, and whatever may be the result of the enquiry, we have no doubt that the future historian of the British administration in this Presidency will not be slow to compliment him for the manner in which he is trying to purify the administration and to make it worthy of the Government which Providence has sent to rule over this country.

7. Referring to the conclusions reported to have been arrived at by the Crawford Commission, the Shri Shiváji (61) of the 8th February says :—Many people are surprised to see that Government should have spent a great deal of money and dug out this mouse from a mountain, but those who know how matters are adjudicated under the British Government will find in this result nothing surprising, as they had anticipated this result of the enquiry by the Commission. [The Satyă Shodhak (58) of the 10th February thinks that if, as is reported, the Crawford Commission consider the case against Mr. Arthur Crawford to be the outcome of a Brahman conspiracy, it must be said to have given an undue scope to its fancy and that in order to prevent such rumours Government should at once publish the report of the Commission. The Indu Prakásh (12) of the 11th February says that by maintaining the theory of a Brahman conspiracy, the Commission has betrayed its meanness and ignorance of human nature. The Bakul (22) of the 10th February remarks :—Many people in Ratnágiri who are the friends and admirers of Mr. Crawford will naturally be glad to hear of his acquittal by the Commission. Whether he be corrupt or not corrupt, he has obliged many natives and has always been particularly kind to the people of Ratnágiri who will not forget him for many years to come. So long as the people do not believe that Mr. Crawford is the only corrupt man in the world and that the others are spotless like washed rice, and so long as they suspect that the case against Mr. Crawford has been started by some designing people to take revenge upon him, those who respect him will undoubtedly continue to side with him. If the action taken against Mr. Crawford be not malicious, how is it that his alleged corrupt practices, extending over ten or twenty years, remained undetected so long? In regard to his indebtedness, it has long been known, and the Governors of Bombay for the last fifteen years and their Councillors come in for a share of the culpability in the matter. The subject remained hidden as long as it was connived at by high officers, and as soon as it came to the notice of an independent man like His Excellency Lord Reay, it came to light, and that too owing to the hatred of some officers towards Mr. Crawford. Such is public opinion. If Lord Reay disposes of the mattter as disinterestedly as he has taken it in hand, many people will be freed from their vices. The Pratod (52) of the 11th February says :—We had already prophesied that the Crawford case would end as it has done at the hands of the Commission. Some people believe that British justice is weighed out by an accurate scale, but it must be remembered that such is not the case where a white man is concerned. It is even feared that perhaps Mr. Crawford may come out as a Governor. Justice and injustice are shams and the only truth is that might is right. The Poona Vaibhav (49) of the 10th February thanks the Crawford Commission for disposing of the case before it just as the people thought it would do and asks why Government should have wasted four lákhs of rupees if the case was to end as it has done. The Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 14th February, considers the conclusions said to have been arrived at by the Crawford Commission in regard to the charges of corruption against Mr. Crawford to be the only conclusions that could legally and impartially be come to on the evidence produced in the case and censures those native newspapers which make unfavourable comments on the Commissioners as being prejudiced and blinded against Mr. Crawford. His Excellency Lord Reay may have good motives, adds the paper, in the action he has taken in this case, but certainly he has not shown sound judgment and good common sense in connection with it.]

8. The Surya Prakásh (85), in its issue of the 9th February, says that the public press had from the very beginning opined that the charge of bribery and corruption brought against such a high officer as Mr. Crawford was very serious and one which could not be believed as true, and that there is nothing surprising if the Commission has acquitted him on that head, as reported. The paper hopes that the Bombay Government will speedily correspond with the Secretary of State for India and that they will not keep Mr. Crawford in suspense for a long time about the decision in his case. [The Anonymous (89), in its issue of the 10th February, remarks that if the rumour regarding Mr. Crawford's acquittal by the Commission on the charge of corruption and bribery be true, the Commission has done nothing but plundered the poor Indian treasury in vain, that the Indian public has great experience of Commissions of Inquiry and that the Crawford Commission will be a new addition to it. The Hindusthán (107), in its issue of the 10th February, says that if Mr. Crawford has really been acquitted of corruption and bribery, the result of the Commission is like catching a rat after digging a hill. The Broach Mitră (93), in its issue of the 13th February, makes the same remark, asks what necessity there was for spending lákhs of rupees on the Commission, thinks that it was perhaps done to show to the people the purity of British justice, and adds that such a result of the Crawford case will enable avaricious Government officers to carry on their nefarious work openly. The Gujarát Darpan (76), in its issue of the 14th February, points out the necessity for publishing the report submitted by the Crawford Commission to Government and requests the Secretary of State for India to do so. It strongly disapproves of the recent writings of the Calcutta correspondent of the London Times and of the St. James's Gazette in connection with the Crawford case and remarks that the conduct of those persons who publish such humbugs is censurable. The Surat Akhbár (84), in its issue of the 11th February, remarks that the boldness shown by the Bombay Government in taking up the Crawford case is praiseworthy, that Government cannot be blamed whether Mr. Crawford be or be not acquitted, that the Bombay University ought to deprive those graduate Mámlatdárs, who have criminated themselves, of the degrees they hold, and that Government should deprive them of their appointments.]

Comments on the writings of the Calcutta correspondent of the London Times and of the St. James's Gazette.

9. The Arunodayă (20), in its issue of the 10th February, says:—The writings of the Calcutta correspondent of the London Times and of the St. James's Gazette are very painful and exasperating. The few native Magistrates who gave bribe to Mr. Crawford gave it not voluntarily but under compulsion. This might be called extortion rather than bribery. There are no signs of the public confidence in native Magistrates in general having been shaken in any degree by a few of them having given bribe to Mr. Crawford, and there is no necessity for a special Commission. It is natural for low-minded Englishmen to condemn His Excellency the Governor for bringing charges of bribery against a high English officer like Mr. Crawford. But the natives consider the Governor highly esteemable. The article in the St. James's Gazette causes the blood to boil and leads one to desire that a native Magistrate of the Bombay Presidency may go to England and holding the editor by the beard ask him whether all native Magistrates in the Bombay Presidency can be said to be corrupt simply because a few of them gave bribe to Mr. Crawford under compulsion, whether it will do to call all the covenanted British officers in the Bombay Presidency corrupt, because the corruption of Mr. Crawford is completely proved in the sight of the general public notwithstanding any conclusion that may be arrived at by the Commission or any decision that may be passed thereon by the Secretary of State for India who acquitted that Wilson of very low character, and whether it is right to judge of the newspaper writers in England like the editor of the St. James's Gazette by the standard of morality of their fellow countrymen in the Bombay Presidency and may kick him violently if his reply is in the negative, as it must be.

10. The Subodh Patrika (16), in its issue of the 10th February, writes:—The conduct of some of the English papers in India and in England towards the Government of His Excellency Lord Reay in the matter of the Crawford Commission and its attendant circumstances reminds one of a common vernacular saw, the purport of which is that while the offender is let off, the innocent is punished. The report of the Commission is not yet published and therefore no comments on its decision can be made; but there can, we believe, be no objection to take the emphatic admissions of the accused himself as true and the rumour published by the local English press is that the Commission has held them to be so. Now what are the facts the Commissioners declare? Why these: that Mr. Crawford, an officer holding a post of great trust and responsibility, was notoriously indebted, that he recklessly borrowed from people within his jurisdiction, that his condition was known to Sir J. Fergusson, the late Governor, who sanctioned his deed of composition with his creditors, &c! And in the face of these declarations of the accused himself we have movers of English opinion in India and in England charging the whole native subordinate magistracy with corruption and Lord Reay and his Council with lending countenance and support to this corrupt magistracy. And some of our own "patriotic" friends in Poona putting forth a wretched shopkeeper as a 'disinterested' lover of abstract justice and equity have been playing into the hands of similar enemies of good government in this unhappy country. Truth and common sense must make it clear to any man that if any administration connived at allegations of corruption or violation of public morality, it was that of Sir James Fergusson. If any one has boldly and courageously faced the evil it is Lord Reay and his colleagues. The native community for years past was scandalized by reports of Mr. Crawford's misconduct and the formal information of his indebtedness placed before the late Governor ought to have led to an inquiry as to his right to continue in the service, one of the chief conditions of the covenant of which he had violated. But instead of that he was allowed to compound matters and was placed in charge of high trusts and vested with vast powers over large interests. Had the ex-Governor acted as he should have done, the present trouble would never have arisen. Every friend of the British administration in India is, therefore, bound to remove difficulties in the path of Lord Reay and his Council instead of adding to them. Natives of India, whatever their other defects—and we are not of those who think it beneficial to whitewash them—are keen in their perception and we, therefore, call upon all manipulators of English opinion, whether here or in England, to be very circumspect in their discussion of this question and to guard against confounding the right with the wrong, or else they will exercise a very prejudicial influence on Indian opinion and the Indian press. We yield to no one in our detestation of officials who receive or give bribe and we shall insist, so far as lies in our humble power, on the removal of every one of such officers from the service; but it is clear that this desire is rendered difficult of accomplishment by conduct calculated to embarrass and bespatter with dirt the very Government that is honestly trying to make for righteousness. We appeal to papers like the Bombay Gazette which without losing sympathy for the accused have retained their love of justice and fair-play and their allegiance to the cause of the purity of the administration and we trust that English opinion, on which we rely for much good, will not disappoint us at this crisis or show to the Indian that where the interests of one of the race of its exponents are concerned, they are no better than the caste-ridden Indian himself, but are ready to wink at any means which secure their private ends even despite the public wrong they may entail.

11. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 11th February, writes:—The Calcutta correspondent of the London Times has proved himself to be so inaccurate and misleading a reporter of Indian news, especially where native interests are concerned, that we are not surprised at the attempt which he is making to discredit Lord Reay's action in regard to Mr. Crawford. During the week the public in India has been informed that both the London Times and the St. James's Gazette have "startling" leaders, denouncing Lord Reay's refusal to remove from office the Magistrates who have admitted having paid bribes to Mr. Crawford and the occasion is said to be utilized by the latter of the two papers for the purpose of denouncing the native magistracy in general. These English newspapers will talk glibly about the necessity for leaving the settlement of Indian questions to Indian administrators on the ground that as responsible officials present on the spot they alone are best acquainted with those questions; and yet in the present instance we find them departing from their own teachings and presuming to sit in judgment on a question of which they have heard only one side and that too from a writer of doubtful accuracy and pronounced prejudices such as the Calcutta correspondent of the Times has proved to be. It seems to us that if there is any vitality in our political associations, and if they wish to prove worthy of the trust which is reposed in them by the native public, they should all rally round Lord Reay's Government at this moment when unfair tactics are being used for the purpose of placing that Government in a false position merely because it has risen equal to the occasion and is striving to show that the British Government will not tolerate even the suspicion of corruption to pollute it. Lord Reay's Government, we take it, is as anxious as the London Times that the administration should be rid of corrupt officials, but those who ask that Government to remove from office at once the Magistrates who have on their own statements bought their offices forget that the Magistrates have to be heard in their defence and the question has yet to be enquired into as to how and under what circumstances they had to buy their offices. That question can fully and fairly be considered only when the final verdict on Mr. Crawford's case has been delivered; but to ask the Government to decide the question now seems to us on the face of it absurd. It is now quite apparent that there is a party which is striving hard to discredit the Government of Bombay for the courage with which it has moved in the matter. It is also clear on the other hand that had that Government not moved, it would have proved itself unworthy of the high principles on which the British rule in India is founded. Having regard to all this we think that it is the duty of our political Associations to be ready to support the Government when attempts are being made to assail it from quarters known to be partial and prejudiced.

12. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 10th February, writes:—So it is going to be all over with the Government and the public of Bombay. The Calcutta correspondent of the Times and some others agree with that enlightened critic in condemning His Excellency the Governor in Council and denouncing the native judicial service as corrupt. What hope can there be now for the Government and the people? Seriously, does it not seem as if a conspiracy was being hatched between Calcutta and London against Lord Reay's Government, and His Excellency and His Councillors were being charged with conniving at or encouraging the very scandal and wrong which they had tried manfully to face and to remove. They have had a veritable Augean stable to cleanse, and yet they are accused of being indifferent to the evil, if not inclined to countenance it! For obvious reasons we cannot be more explicit just now, but we beg to warn all exponents of Anglo-Indian and English opinion to beware of how they act at the present crisis, for a crisis it morally and practically is; or else the said exponents will exercise a disastrous influence on the much-abused Native Press of India, which cannot help being demoralized by such a spectacle. As to conspiracy in Bombay or in Poona, if there was a rumour of any, its object, it ought to be clear by this time, was to burke and thwart enquiry into the alleged corruption, and to fabricate charges of corruption. Authentic details on this point may probably be got from the Brahman shopkeeper, Sáthe of Poona, if the Calcutta correspondent of the Times or the informer of St. James's Gazette can get hold of that friend of abstract truth and justice in British territory.

13. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 10th February, writes:—His Excellency Lord Reay has a difficult task before him. In the Crawford case he has been doing his best to do full justice to all concerned and as a reward of such scrupulous regard for fairness and justice he is being abused in the Anglo-Indian Press and in the English Press at Home. The Judges' protest and the Bombay Government's reply to it are made the peg on which to hang much acrimonious criticism on the ways of the Bombay Government. But these good people forget that they have heard only one side of the question. The side of the protesting Judges has been laid fully before the public, while the only thing that we have seen of the Government side is the short resolution passed in reply to the protest and the inference to be deduced from the refusal of the other Judges to join their colleagues. But people, when they wish to give vent to their preconceived notions do not stop to think whether the occasion justifies the ebullition or not. The St. James's Gazette has gone further than all the other English critics although these have written strongly enough. The Gazette makes the Judges' protest a text to preach a sermon against the Indian National Congress which is a thorn in its side. The telegraphic summary, meagre as it is, is sufficiently intelligible. It says:—"The St. James's Gazette has a startling leader, contains a sweeping slander of the entire lower native magistracy, which, it says, is corrupt. These corrupt Bombay Magistrates, says the Gazette, are only fair types of the educated natives who meet together in Congress, and their conception of public morality is of exactly the same stamp." The paper adds:—"We assert that the fact is so." Now in the first place the fact is that the St. James's Gazette by indulging in a sweeping slander of the entire lower native magistracy betrays a want of that judiciousness which is so essential to the critic. It shows that it starts with a bias against not only the Mámlatdárs but the whole native community. It represents the natives of India as wanting in public morality—a charge which needs not be rebutted, since better informed men than the writer in the Gazette have before this fully and freely acknowledged the fairness, the honesty, and the high-mindedness of native officials. Wilful misrepresentation of one's opponents is one of the ways which Tory organs like the St. James's Gazette discredit themselves by using against their political antagonists. The National Congress has attracted the attention of the English public by its constitutional ways and its modest demands, and it is feared that this awakening of public interest might do harm to vested interests and to the monopolists of power and patronage in India. The Gazette comes to their rescue and uses the disclosures made in the Crawford enquiry to point a moral. It says that these corrupt Bombay Magistrates are only fair types of the educated natives who meet together in Congress. The paper emphasizes this assertion and no doubt a few gullible people may accept the conclusions of the Gazette with the authority of a sacred book. With such people we have nothing to do. But sensible people will, we are sure, take all this raving nonsense at its worth. We cannot understand how some people have convinced themselves that all these Mámlatdárs are corrupt. In the case of a few of them the term may be correct, but there are a good many of them who gave money under downright compulsion from above and against whom there is not a word of reproach with regard to their work. It is hard to condemn such people without taking this fact into consideration. Those who do so, ignore considerations of justice and equity in their pursuit of an ideal principle. If as the Gazette says the entire lower native magistracy is corrupt, then we shall have to suppose that the entire superior European establishment consists mostly of fools. We do not know if such a conclusion will give any satisfaction to critics like these. Then again let us ask what reason we have to suppose that the native Magistrates in the divisions other than the Central are also corrupt? Is not the fact that these misdoings are all spoken of in connection with those divisions which were under the charge of Mr. Crawford a very significant one? But such considerations of what is probable and what is improbable rarely disturb the equanimity of men who come prepared to condemn before they have heard. The Gazette represents these Mámlatdárs as fair types of the Congressionists. But it forgets that the men who attend the Congress have nothing in common with the men in Government service. The former are made of sterner stuff than the latter, and had the Gazette's statement been true, namely, had the Mámlatdárs that firmness of character which distinguishes the Congressman, we should scarcely have heard of such a great scandal as that which has been the main topic of private conversation all over the Presidency. On the whole, the article in the St. James's Gazette, to judge from the telegraphic summary, must contain many mis-statements, unfair misrepresentations and wrong, preconceived conclusions which would seriously affect the worth of the views set forth therein.

The Mámlatdárs involved in the Crawford case and their fate.

14. The Jagaddárdarsh (34), in its issue of the 10th February, says:—The Mámlatdárs involved in the Crawford case seem to be overtaken by misfortune and God alone is able to bring them out of their present difficulties. If they had not told the truth, they would have been persecuted by the Government, but by confessing the truth they have become an object of public ridicule and adverse criticism. For the sake of the belly they are prepared to quietly put up with ridicule, but men like Sáthe will not let them alone. The Bombay High Court again is against them and it is difficult for them to surmount all these difficulties. The London Times has deprecated their retention in the service and the favourable attitude of His Excellency Lord Reay towards them. This public organ is powerful and it is necessary for Lord Reay to consider its writings. But the Mámlatdárs have divulged their secrets on the strength of the assurances given to them by Government and it will not behove the latter to leave them to the tender mercies of their opponents. [The Dnyán Chakshu (9), in its issue of the 13th idem, says that it has no doubt that Government will not break their faith with the Mámlatdárs, and that they are quite safe and that the writings of the newspapers giving vent to absurd ideas are useless and deserve no attention from men of common sense and good judgment. The Pratod (52), in its issue of the 11th idem, says that the Government is bound to let the Mámlatdárs go unscathed, that if it does not do so it will never be able to expose high but corrupt officers in future and that the expedients used by the Government in the Crawford case are exactly those which are necessary to be adopted in the interests of good government. The Poona Vaibhav (49), in its issue of the 10th February, says:—Undoubtedly the Mámlatdárs must be guilty either of corruption or of giving false evidence. If Government acquit Mr. Crawford of corruption they must have the Mámlatdárs hauled up for perjury. There is no other alternative. What a darkness it is that under the British Government things which have actually taken place in the presence of millions of men should turn out to be unproved and those which have never taken place should turn out to be proved. Is this not jugglery or a sleight of hand?]

Circular issued by the Collector of Thána against the possession of mowra flowers.

15. In noticing the circular issued by Mr. Todd, Collector of Thána, and the notices issued by the ábkári inspectors holding the possession of mowra flowers to be illegal, the Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 15th February, says:—Sir James Fergusson's Government attempted to make the possession of mowra flowers illegal but Lord Ripon withheld his sanction from the proposed law as these flowers are an article of food. Notwithstanding this Mr. Todd has held such possession illegal, and the step he has taken ought to be protested against in the interests of the poor people who use these flowers as food. If contraband liquor is distilled, it is the duty of the Ábkári Department to detect the crime, but the poor people ought not to be deprived of the flowers since they form an article of food and trade. Mr. Todd's circular is a violation of the standing order of the Supreme Government, and the Bombay Government ought to cancel it at once.

Approval of the proposed amendment in the Indian Penal Code about raising the age of consent for girls in India.

16. The Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 15th February, expresses approval of the attempt made by Mr. Malbári for an amendment of the Indian Penal Code for raising the age of consent for girls in India, observing that both humanity and discretion require the amendment, that though the Deccanis act discreetly in the matter the people of Gujarát and Káthiáwár are very reckless and suffer most from the evil, that it is gratifying that distinguished Indian and European gentlemen are in favour of the proposed change and that it is to be hoped that it will be made. [The Akhbáre Sodágar (88) of the 11th February also approves of the proposed amendment.]

A suggestion in connection with the rules sanctioned by the Bombay Government about the marriage expenses among the Lewa Kunbi caste in Gujarát.

17. The Svadesh Bandhu (135), in its issue of the 13th February, refers to the rules sanctioned by the Bombay Government regarding the marriage expenses among the Lewa Pátidárs, points out the necessity for preventing the sale of girls in marriage and the heavy expenditure on caste feasts given in connection with the death of a Lewa Pátidár, and requests the leading men among the Pátidárs to have these two points also included in the new rules sanctioned by Government for their benefit.

Praise of Mr. Lee-Warner, C.S., Secretary to the Bombay Government in the Political, Judicial and Educational Departments.

18. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 10th February, writes:—We regret that ill health deprives the Political, Judicial, and Educational Departments of the Secretariat of Mr. Lee-Warner's services, though only for a year. His short but varied experience of district affairs, and of the working of political agencies in Native States, with his knowledge of the ways of the Foreign Office of the Government of India, joined to his interest in and acquaintence with the details of public instruction, his energy, shrewdness and desire for a straightforward, even if occasionally a tight administration, peculiarly fit him for being the right hand of Government for supervising the conduct of affairs in Native States and in our own districts. His name, we believe, has already begun to be associated with a wholesome influence in many of the former. The life infused into his work by Mr. Lee-Warner, as a result of his fresh knowledge as well as energy, is such that, we are told, some of the Political officers are even withholding their references to Government till his departure, rather than, by timely submission, invite his vigorous criticism thereon. We do not know how far this rumour is well founded, but its very existence is an indication of the efficacy of a discriminating supervision at head-quarters, and unless such supervision is vigilantly maintained, the work of the entire Government might as well be carried on by a Secretary in each department approving and signing the abstracts, the summaries and sheepish notes, drawn up by the subordinate staff taking its cue from the 'official' version of the story, instead of requiring for the task the cumbrous and costly machinery of a Council and a President. We, therefore, urge upon the Government of Bombay the desirability of adopting the plan of a periodical change in the personnel of its Secretariat, and of confining the appointments generally to men with a fresh knowledge of the country and its people and, therefore, of the real requirements of the administration.

Appointment of Mr. Monteath as Acting Secretary to the Bombay Government in the Political, Judicial and Educational Departments.

19. The same paper says:—Mr. Monteath, who acts for Mr. Lee-Warner, has had no political experience, but he is an able man and a thorough, conscientious worker. If with these advantages and the insight he has had, as Private Secretary, into the working of the administrative machinery as a whole he follows up the lines of his predecessor, he may well be expected to discharge the duties of his new office with equal credit. Indeed, his appointment being made by His Excellency Lord Reay is accepted in itself as a guarantee of that result.

Praise of Mr. Jehángirsháh E. Kohiyár, Compiler of the last Administration Report of the Bombay Presidency.

20. The Rást Goftár (83), in its issue of the 10th February, writes:—When a Native is appointed to a responsible post and acquits himself creditably of his task, it is matter for congratulation to the whole community. We must regard his success as a triumph of the principles on which the claims of qualified Natives to higher appointments under Government are based. These remarks are suggested by the recent publication of the Administration Report of the Bombay Presidency for the year 1887-88, the compilation of which was for the first time entrusted to a Native official, Mr. Jehángirsháh E. Kohiyár. The way in which Mr. Kohiyár has performed his work, which used to be done hitherto by European covenanted officers, fully justifies the confidence which Government must have had in his capacity when they appointed him on this special duty. A glance over the report will convince any one that the task of putting into shape and order a vast mass of materials could by no means be a light one. But we hope the compiler of the report was consoled in his arduous labours by the patriotic reflection that under every head of department it was his pleasing duty to denote prosperity and progress.

Ráo Bahádur Káshináth Laxman Chándorkar, late Police Inspector, Jalgaon, and a notice published by him to dispel suspicions about his character.

21. The Khándesh Chitragupta (40), in its issue of the 10th February, in a very long article refers to a notice published for the third time in its columns by Ráo Bahádur Káshináth Lakshman Chándorkar, late Police Inspector, Jalgaon, in which the latter has earnestly called upon all those who may have to say anything against him to the District Officer to do so within 15 days from the publication of the notice, which is dated the 10th instant, and gives an account of the valuable services rendered by him to Government since he was employed in the Police Department on Rs. 14 per mensem in 1857, and says that Ráo Bahádur Chándorkar was honoured with the title of Ráo Bahádur in 1883 in recognition of his services in connection with the detection of dacoits in the Khándesh District. It adds that Ráo Bahádur Chándorkar was popular with and was highly praised for his honesty and zeal in the discharge of his duties by European District Officers who served in the district from time to time, that he was recommended by such men as Colonel Wise, Major Probin and Mr. Propert, at present Commissioner, S. D., and that the above-named officers will be grieved to learn that the Ráo Bahádur whose services were spotless and against whom there was not a single complaint throughout his service, but who was on the contrary highly spoken of and was given promotions and certificates of good conduct from time to time, should be obliged to publish such a notice, probably to satisfy his superiors about his good conduct.

The case of Private Swift tried at the last criminal sessions of the Bombay High Court commented upon.

22. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 11th February, writes:—Those who have followed carefully the evidence which was produced against Private Swift, who was tried at the criminal sessions of the Bombay High Court last week on a charge of murder and acquitted, cannot but regret that there has been a miscarriage of justice. The evidence for the prosecution showed that the accused, while out shooting, approached a number of Kunbi villagers, who were at their meals and who asked him not to come near them, that thereupon the accused got excited and shot one of the men dead. The accused's defence was that while shooting he happened to kill by accident a dog, whereupon some of the villagers including the deceased attacked him, and in the scuffle which ensued his gun went off and killed the deceased by accident. No dog was found and there was nothing in the case to substantiate the story of the accused. Nevertheless a majority of the jurors who tried the accused found no difficulty in acquitting him on the ground that the case for the prosecution seemed to them doubtful. It is the old story again. Verdicts like these are all the more to be regretted, because they not only lower the prestige of British justice, but are calculated to encourage European shikáris in caring little for the lives of innocent Native villagers.

23. The same paper, in its vernacular columns, says:—The jury acquitted the accused though it was proved by the evidence of several cultivators that he had wilfully shot the deceased. There is nothing very strange in this result of the trial, as it was already predicted by many people. Europeans and Eurasians are naturally very irritable towards Natives, and we do not think that Swift acted in discord with this trait of the general character of his race in firing at the deceased cultivator. It is said that in adjudicating between Europeans and Natives the impartiality of Englishmen is a little swerved from. This allegation is not altogether false. [While writing about this case several other newspapers also express dissatisfaction with the verdict of the jury. The Arunodayă (20) of the 10th idem says that instead of enacting such farces it would be better if it were laid down as a rule that no offences by Europeans against Natives should be the subjects of trials in courts of law. The verdict of the jury and the order of the court in the case of Swift are highly suggestive. The Jagadádarsh (34) of the same date says:—In this case the guilt of the accused is proved by the evidence produced, which is quite decisive and there is no room for doubt, and yet the jury gives the accused the benefit of doubt. Can this be called justice? The counsel for the accused speaks very highly of his character and says that he has never up to this time committed a single offence. Is this a sufficient reason to acquit the accused of the present charge? If cases are decided in this manner innumerable murderers will escape punishment. That many such European offenders escape scot-free at the hands of European juries is a kind of encouragement to them. We do not know what to say of men, who are employed at our cost and for our protection, wantonly taking our life and yet escaping punishment in courts of law. There would therefore be no room for complaints of partiality if it were directed that European offenders should, like Natives, be tried by sessions courts without juries.]

24. The Nyáyă Sindhu (47), in its issue of the 11th February, says that this is a nice sample of the kind of justice done in cases in which the accused are Europeans and that there is now no doubt that the laws and courts of justice in India are intended for the Natives alone. [The Rájyabhakt (124), in its issue of the 12th February, observes that it would have been better if the Judge had empanelled another jury to try the case, that the failure to take this step may be said to encourage the popular belief that European offenders are treated with leniency, that the defence put forward, viz., accidental shooting, cannot be believed, and that it is necessary that special care should be taken to avoid the impression that no justice is to be had in cases where Europeans are the accused parties. The Gujarát Darpan (76), in its issue of the 10th February, remarks that such decisions of the mofussil courts are frequently complained against, but that when the High Court follows the same course, it is no use further complaining in the matter. The Hindusthán (107), in its issue of the 10th February, says that in such cases the murderers are generally rash and over-bearing European soldiers or British youths, that the true cause of the murders of Natives by them is that the former is a subject race, that they think that killing a "black man" is not more serious than killing a lower animal, and that Government ought at once to stop such murders, which are increasing in number and which do immense harm both to Europeans and Natives, either by duly punishing the culprits, by devising some means for increasing the regard entertained by Europeans for the Natives, or by taking severe notice of the authorities concerned in the miscarriage of justice. The Chandră Prakásh (97), in its issue of 11th February, observes that the acquittal of Europeans who kill Natives while out hunting tarnishes the reputation of the British Government, and that the chief causes of such murders are the defects in the law and the negligence to remove them. The Pakhvádyáni Maják (120) of the 15th February is not surprised at the acquittal of Private Swift, for it says that such is generally the case where Europeans are concerned, disapproves of the sentence of transportation for life passed at the same criminal sessions of the Bombay High Court on an old Parsi named Dorábji Sorábji for stealing a watch, and of the sentence of transportation for 10 years passed on another Pársi for attempting to murder his wife, and expresses surprise at the acquittal by the Judge of the Byculla murderer tried at the same sessions in disregard of the verdict pronounced by two successive special juries.]

25. The Rást Goftár (83), in its issue of the 10th February, writes :—The most remarkable verdict given by a jury at the present criminal sessions was that in the case of Private Swift who was charged with deliberately shooting a Native in the Ahmednagar Táluka. The presiding Judge very appropriately called the jury's attention to the fact that no dog was to be found, and that when the Sergeant came upon the scene, the prisoner did not attempt to show the place where he had shot the dog, nor was any effort made to discover the animal dead or alive. If the story of the defence has any truth in it, we must credit the villagers with the acuteness and the presence of mind to spirit away the dog, in order to invent on the spot quite a false charge and bolster it up by removing all trace of the dog. And the story of the prisoner coming up to them, while they were eating their food, must be a wicked myth told by them, with every circumstantiality of detail, to bring within perilous proximity to the gallows a fellow-being who was sorry for having killed a dog, and who tried every means to soothe the exasperated owners of the animal by assuring them that he would pay for it, if only they took the trouble to come to his quarters. For the sweetness and forbearance of the soldier, the Natives showed extraordinary malice and rancour. There were witnesses for the defence to say that the prisoner had always borne a good character —a statement which was rather spoiled by the fact that he had once deserted the army and on the present occasion had gone out shooting without leave. But whatever the value of this part of the defence, there was the evidence of the four villagers which none of the arts of cross-examination could cause to break through, and the Judge too said something to that effect in his charge to the jury. Yet the jury, which consisted of Eurasians, East Indians and Goanese with one Hindu, brought with one dissentient, a verdict of not guilty. "We give the prisoner the benefit of the doubt, my Lord," said the Foreman. The benefit of the doubt! A most convenient phrase, surely. We are sorry for this decision for two reasons. The first is that an impression will be formed naturally, if not quite fairly, by the Natives of the place where this death has occurred, that in a conflict between Europeans and Natives there is danger of a gross miscarriage of justice. The other, and the stronger reason for our regret is that such verdicts resulting from the stupidity or partiality of juries are calculated seriously to impair in the minds of the illiterate soldiers whatever reverence they might otherwise feel for the life of a Native. [The Gujaráti (78), in its issue of the 10th February, observes that the murders of poor villagers and other low-class Natives by hot-headed European planters and European soldiers once more appear to be on the increase, that the Native public has begun to think that great injustice is done in such cases and that European offenders are unjustly protected, that European Judges and juries would not certainly thus let off Natives charged with murdering Europeans if they put forward a defence similar to that brought forward by Europeans, that British justice is tarnished by such partiality on the part of Judges towards their co-religionists, that another evil resulting therefrom is that rancorous feelings are produced among Natives against Europeans on seeing their poor and simple-natured countrymen causelessly killed by Europeans, that such result is to some extent dangerous to the safety of the British rule, and that it is to be hoped that the authorities will speedily attend to the matter.]

26. The Sind Sudhár (164), in its issue of the 9th February, writes:— The Small Causes Court at Karáchi seems to be as unfortunate as that of Shikárpur, and we long to see the day when its work will be done more satisfactorily. People have often complained of the delay which occurs in the despatch of business. To say nothing of important civil cases, considerable delay takes place in the disposal of petty cases also. We therefore are inclined to think that until the establishment of this Court is reorganised and placed on a more efficient basis by the appointment of a competent Native Judge, the evils complained of must continue to exist. To remedy the present state of things, we are of opinion that the recommendation which the Sind Sabha made some years ago to Sir James Fergusson, the then Governor of Bombay, when he visited Sind, should be carried out. The Sind Sabha in its address to His Excellency the Governor pointed out that it was not by any means necessary to have such a high salary attached to the office of the Small Causes Court's Judge, and that it would be better if a Native Subordinate Judge with Small Causes Court jurisdiction were to be appointed on a salary of Rs. 500 only, in place of the present Judge. The Governor, in reply, said that he would give the suggestion his careful attention, but no steps have up to this time been taken in the matter. It seems to us that the Sind Sabha has never since then moved in the matter or pressed it fo rthe consideration of Government. When Mr. Foxton was about to retire, the intelligent and educated Natives were of opinion that a competent and experienced Native Judge should be appointed in his place. But for several reasons the people did not petition Government against the nomination of Mr. Pinhey, and accordingly he was nominated. But experience has proved that the services of a competent Native are absolutely necessary. At present more delay than ever takes place in the despatch of business. That Mr. Pinhey is an experienced officer, well up in law, cannot be denied; but the delay which takes place in the disposal of cases is nevertheless most remarkable. This clearly proves that it is a mistake to appoint a European as Judge of the Small Causes Court. Is it that the cases coming before this Court are of such a nature that no Native can be found able to dispose of them satisfactorily? It would appear that such cases are very rarely filed and that in Mr. Pinhey's time hardly one has come up for disposal. We hope that the Sind Sabha, which takes so much interest in the amelioration of the condition of Sind, will inquire into this matter and move Government to reconsider its recommendation about the conversion of the Small Causes Court into a subordinate Civil Court and will appoint an experienced Native Judge on a salary of Rs. 500 per mensem. During the time that Mr. Dáyáram Gidumal acted as Judge of the Small Causes Court at Karáchi the work was done much more promptly and satisfactorily. Being a Native of Sind he did not require the services of a Registrar to interpret to him the depositions of witnesses, &c. The appointment of a competent Native Judge will dispense with the necessity for a Registrar on a high salary. We hope that His Excellency Lord Reay, who always attaches great weight to the opinions of the people of Sind, will give the subject his careful attention and sanction the Sind Sabha's recommendation. Work will then be disposed of more promptly than now. At present the Karáchi Small Causes Court exists only in name.

The Bombay Government requested to publish the names of those Native newspapers which are edited either by damaged characters, or school-boys, or persons of unknown social status.

27. The Rájyabhakt (124), in its issue of the 12th February, says:—The remarks made in the last Administration Report of the Bombay Presidency with regard to the Native press are not just. It is to be regretted that the names of the newspapers edited by men either dismissed from the Government service or convicted of criminal offences, or by school-boys or persons of no status, have not been given in the report. It does not appear that these remarks have been made after due enquiry, for why should Government have hesitated to publish the names if they had correct information regarding them? It is a detestable attempt either to disgrace or to lower the Native press in this presidency. We still desire that Government should publish the names of these newspapers, so that the public may beware of having any connection with them or that it may assure itself of the correctness or otherwise of the remarks made in the report. Are Government afraid of procedings for libel? [The Dnyán Ságar (28) of the 11th idem also recommends that the names of such newspapers should be published.]

Grievances of passengers by coasting steamers plying between Bombay and Goa.

28. The Din Bandhu (7), in its issue of the 10th February, writes:—It is understood that a memorial to the Bombay Government has been got up, detailing the grievances of passengers by the coasting steamers plying between Bombay and Goa. The contents of the memorial we have not been able to ascertain; but we have it from men having personal experience of the inconvenience and discomfort of a sea trip in one of these steamers that there is much room for improvement in the rules and usages which govern this daily increasing passenger traffic. However good the regulations may be, they are, at least in the matter of overcrowding seldom enforced by the Customs authorities. In the third class, men, women and children are allowed to be huddled together like a flock of sheep driven into a confined enclosure. It often happens that the surplus passengers, unable to find room anywhere, rush into the part reserved for second class passengers, to the great annoyance of the latter. This is not an extraordinary occurrence, but happens, we are told, as a rule daily. To add to their sufferings, the deck on which the passengers squat closely packed together becomes soon heated by the furnace, especially in summer, and the men, women and children, mostly sea-sick and unable to move or to stand erect, bear the stifling heat with an endurance which is certainly heroic. No arrangements exist for the proper storage of luggage, which is often stolen and it is but rarely that the thief is caught. It is suspected that professional pick-pockets and thieves find great facilities on board these steamers for carrying on their nefárious trade. These are some of the drawbacks to the otherwise very popular line of communication along the Konkan coast established by Messrs. Shepherd & Co. The main complaint is that of overcrowding, and in any relief proposed, some effectual remedy is necessary to prevent the regulated maximum number of passengers being exceeded. Perhaps the area set apart might be partitioned off by iron railings to hold, say, a dozen persons in each division, and the number to be accommodated marked conspicuously on boards in the Maráthi and Gujaráti languages. We hope that the Bombay Government will enquire carefully into the grievances of the memorialists and will afford them full redress. The wail comes from the poorest of rayats, who are, as a rule, very patient under suffering and but seldom complain unless under the severest trials.

Collection of the land revenue assessment in some villages of the Broach District.

29. The Broach Mitră (93), in its issue of the 13th February, says that owing to the scanty fall of rain last year and the consequent failure of crops, some of the rayats in some villages of the Vágra and Jambusar sub-divisions had petitioned Mr. Mackenzie, Collector of Broach, to grant them takávi advances and to allow them to pay the land revenue assessment next year. No reply has, observes the paper, been received up to this time, but orders have been issued for the payment of the land revenue assessment. Some of the rayats of some of the neighbouring villages therefore intend to go shortly to Songad Vyára in the Surat District to earn their livelihood.

Government requested to continue their grant-in-aid to the PárekhDispensary, Surat.

30. In a contributed article the Gujarát Mitră (19), in its issue of the 10th February, writes :—It is not needful for us to say how sincerely we regret to announce the rather unchari-table attitude of the Bombay Government towards the maintenance of the local Párekh Dispensary. The Municipality was asked by Government a short time back to introduce the fee system in this dispensary, with a clear understanding that the annual grant of Rs. 1,800 would be immediately stopped, if the orders were not duly carried out. Our civic fathers, unprepared for such a threat, after a careful investiga-tion into the matter by a special committee, and after a searching consultation of the interests of the masses rightly concluded that looking to the abject poverty of those who availed of the advantages offered by this institution as well as to the unbearable burden of taxation already resting on their shoulders, it was their painful duty to express their inability to act according to the wishes of the Government. But it is much to be regretted that Government has treated this mature conclusion with a peculiar indifference and has finally resolved upon the discontinuance of the grant. We think it our duty to raise our humble voice on behalf of the local public and respectfully ask Government for a reconsideratio of the matter. We wish that our appeal may receive the most sympathetic consideration from the authorities concerned.

Expression of regret at the death of Mr. D. S. White.

31. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 10th February, writes :—By the death of Mr. D. S. White the Eurasian com-munity loses a staunch and sincere friend. The natives of India also have been deprived of an earnest well-wisher by Mr. White's removal. His example ought to cheer those whose lot it is to work for interests neglected or despised. For energy, steadfastness and powers of organization there are not many in India whom we could place side by side with this fine, old Eurasian. [Several other papers also regret his death.]

Wandering Cabuli tribes in Gujarát and the mischief done by them.

32. The Gujarát Mitră (79), in its issue of the 10th February, complains of the wandering tribes of Cabulis doing much mis-chief and at times plundering people in places visited by them in Gujarát, refers to a recent case of plunde by them in the village of Kadráma in the Surat Di trict, says that the Police are only able to send them off from one village t another where they continue their evil practices, and requests Government t stop them from visiting Gujarát. [The Gujaráti (78), in its issue of the 10th February, also suggests that wandering tribes of Cabulis should be prevented by Government from entering towns or villages in the districts. The Broac Mitră (93), in its issue of the 13th February, says the same thing.]

Frequency of murders in Bombay and insufficiency of the Police force.

33. The Telagu Mitră (18), in its issue of the 16th February, says that o late murders are frequently committed in the cit of Bombay, that the cause of these murders is th insufficiency of the Police force, that several dange ous roads have not a single Police constable posted o them, and that the people are much afraid to move about in the town at late hour at night, and requests the head of the Bombay Police to remove th cause of uneasiness felt by the people since the recent commission of two murde in the part of the town called Kumbhárváda.

Contemplated reduction in the strength of the Police in the Kaira District disapproved.

34. The Svadesh Bandhu (135) of the 13th February hears that Gover ment intend to effect a saving of Rs. 300 per mense by reducing the number of policemen in the Kai District, is surprised at this contemplated reductio at a time when crime has increased in the distri and when the Police force ought to be strengthened, says that the step is likel to lead to a breach of the peace among the Mevásis and among the Mahomeda who largely inhabit the district, and that Rs. 300 can easily be saved by applying the shears to the salary of highly-paid officers like the Collector, and requests Government to abstain from carrying out the proposed measure.

PART II.—Legislation.

Extension of the English Factory Act to India disapproved.

35. The Vengurla Vritt (65), in its issue of the 7th February, says that the recommendation of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce to extend the operation of the English Factory Act to India is not made out of sympathy for the Indian mill labourers but from a sinister desire to handicap the Bombay mill industry, and that the fears once entertained by the people of India in this respect were removed by the benevolent Mr. Caine, M.P., in his speech at Poona. [The Suryă Prakásh (85), in its issue of the 8th February, also sees no necessity for any change in the present Indian Factory Acts.]

Comments on the Bombay Village Sanitation Bill.

36. While commenting on the Bombay Village Sanitation Bill, the Shubh Suchak (62), in its issue of the 8th February, says that in villages in which there are no schools and where no portion of the Local Fund is spent for the benefit of the cess-payers it will be better to set apart a certain amount from this fund to meet the expenses incurred on their conservancy, that the amount of fine proposed to be inflicted under the Bill should at the most be Rs. 2 and not Rs. 10, and that there should be no sentence of imprisonment under any circumstances. [The Vidushak (66), in its issue of the 11th February, observes that the nomination of the members of the sanitary committees should be entrusted not to the Collectors but to the villagers themselves, that any tax imposed on the villagers on account of the sanitation of their villages will be oppressive and that Government should provide for the necessary expenses.]

PART III.—Education.

His Excellency Lord Reay's assurances with regard to his attitude towards higher education.

37. Writing about the Elphinstone College in its new home and its opening ceremony by His Excellency Lord Reay, the Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 11th February, expresses a wish that the College were located in a more solitary place and observes:—The more agreeable part of last Monday's proceedings was the assurance Lord Reay gave in respect to his attitude towards higher education. Ever since His Lordship's speech at the Sind Arts College there have been fears entertained that His Lordship looked upon higher education with no loving eyes. As Mr. Pherozshah M. Mehta put it, the affection for the younger sister seemed to have been too absorbing to leave any scope for the elder. His Lordship's presence at the Elphinstone College on Monday last and his professions of regard dispel those fears. The policy enunciated of concentrating Government resources on a few model institutions raises the fear that some of the less favoured institutions may stand in peril of being abolished. We earnestly ask Government not to abolish or cripple the resources of any of the existing institutions. No new schools or colleges may be started, but we wish that the existing institutions should be maintained in their full strength. The further strengthening of model institutions should be done with extra funds. His Lordship's assurance that no retrenchment has been made in the educational grant, is most welcome. The announcement that Government accepts the responsibilities of maintaining higher education of the country at a high level is highly gratifying. It is also pleasing to note that Dr. Peterson on behalf of the institution he represents, and Ráo Sáheb Vishvanáth Náráyan Mandlik, Mr. Pherozshah and Mr. Telang on behalf of the people made an emphatic protest against the spirit of decrying higher education displayed in some quarters—a protest which met with an agreeable response from Lord Reay himself.

An appeal to the Governor General in the matter of the Ahmednagar High School recommended.

38. The Nagar Samáchár (45), in its issue of the 9th February, expresses its inability to reconcile the Bombay Government's Resolution about the Ahmednagar High School with the announcement made by His Excellency Lord Reay in a speech at Kárwár, and requests the people of Ahmednagar not to sit quiet but to represent the matter to His Excellency Lord Lansdowne and to see whether he at least will act according to his utterances at the Convocation of the Calcutta University.

Comments on the educational policy of the Bombay Government as enunciated in their recent Resolution on high schools.

39. The Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 11th February, publishes Government Resolution No. 113 in the Educational Department, dated 19th January 1889, and says:—The policy as set forth in the foregoing Resolution is so opposed to that recommended by the Education Commission and confirmed both by the Government of India and the Secretary of State for India, that we are surprised that the Bombay Government should have taken such a step, more especially at a time when the present Secretary to Government in the Educational Department (Mr. Lee-Warner), who was a Member of the Education Commission and who, if we are correctly informed, drew up the report of the Bombay Committee of that Commission, ought to have been able to influence the policy of the local Government in an authoritative and responsible manner. It would seem that His Excellency Lord Reay is exceptionally unfortunate in his educational policy. It would further seem that in his anxiety to ensure the success of the Victoria Jubilee Technical Institute and to set free funds for that institution His Lordship is sacrificing other equally useful institutions. We think that the people in this Presidency ought to lose no time in vigorously protesting against this policy and in obtaining a reversal of the same at the hands of the Government of India. It is notorious that there are no private bodies or societies in any of the districts of this Presidency to which the local Government can transfer the direct management and control of the existing high schools. The only local bodies that are available or rather can be made available are the municipalities, and Government may, if it be absolutely necessary, try the experiment on a small scale by transferring two or three of the existing high schools to municipalities and watch the result. It would be madness to do so in the case of all municipalities. But it is something worse than madness to transfer such schools to societies hurriedly called into being. The Ahmednagar Education Society is a society of this character, and although we do not wish to say anything to its discredit, we trust that its members themselves will not object to being described in the way we have done. We are perfectly aware of the circumstances connected with the origin of that society. It was suddenly called into existence about two years ago, when it was feared that the local Government City School (a middle-class institution) was about to be transferred to the local Missionaries or to be abolished in favour of their institution. We put it to all fair-minded men whether it is at all fair to effect such enforced transfers of Government educational institutions to spurious societies. It was certainly not the intention of the authors of the Education Despatch of 1854 or of the Education Commission that such tranfers should be effected, and yet we find the Bombay Government actually bent upon following such a course. The educational future of this Presidency, if the Bombay Government is permitted to follow its own course, is full of peril, and Government will, we have no doubt, repent of it when it is too late. It is to be hoped, therefore, that the Bombay Government will be compelled betimes to strictly and loyally carry out the policy laid down in the Education Commission's report. [The Gujaráti (78) of the 10th and the Broach Mitra (93) of the 13th February say that Government have thrown the burden of primary education on municipalities, that they now wish to make the public bear the burden of secondary education, that it is a matter for deep regret that Government should day after day reduce the expenditure on education, which is already very small, and that such a course does not create a good opinion about them among the people.]

The effects of placing high schools under European head masters on the national character of the Indians and suggestions as to the formation of school committees.

40. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 10th February, writes:—With the information that we have in our possession we can assert, and assert without the least fear of being contradicted, that the policy which Government has resolved upon following in the matter of secondary education does not find favour with anybody beyond the Secretariat, and even about that we are doubtful. If we are correctly informed, and we think we are, the head of the Educational Department, the head masters of the leading high schools in the districts, and the managers of aided institutions agree in thinking that the raising of fees in high schools, and especially in the case of those which happen to be solitary institutions of their kind in their respective localities, will strike a heavy blow at secondary education. In the case of localities which possess efficient institutions, Government and private, the raising of fees may go to encourage private enterprise and the measure need not, therefore, create alarm. But such localities are few—we do not know if their number can go beyond two—and it may therefore be justly said that the policy now enunciated is patently prejudicial to the cause of secondary education directly and higher education indirectly. We have consulted many gentlemen who are in a position to speak with authority on such matters, and they all agree in thinking that the proposed arrangement of free and half-free studentships will little assist in acting as a counterpoise to resist the marked tendency in the policy of shutting out boys from high schools. The idea of continuing only a few institutions and keeping them up as models for competing institutions is good and may be practically enforced; but to this is tacked on another, viz., that of appointing English head masters, and we are sorry to find that the evil effects of this are so glaring that the tiny good feature in the idea is at once left nowhere. A school under a European head master being placed on an entirely different basis cannot be a competitor of one completely under Native management. The object of the one system differs entirely from that of the other. Without in any way wishing to raise the caste controversy, we say that we do not want in our school administration any element that will denationalize the young mind. In saying this let us assure the public that we are only reiterating the spirit of the Magna Charta of Education, a spirit which successive administrators have constantly cherished, a spirit above all in which lies the solution of the educational problem. Anybody that opposes this, be he Hindu, Mahomedan or European, opposes progress, opposes the best interests and growth of the nation and loosens the hold our rulers have upon us as their subjects, and in short destroys the strongest foundation of the British rule in India. The policy laid down in the Educational Despatch of 1854 has been carried out during the last 34 years, and what result do we see now? Leading men of the educated community show that they have not yet been fitted for self-government in education. They have lost all love for their vernaculars and would even go to the length of saying that English should become the lingua Franca of their country. They would have Government institutions maintained at an enormous cost and would not allow funds to be set free for the promotion of the education of the many. These opinions and others like these only show that the results of the system have been anything but beneficial. The policy laid down in the Despatch is very comprehensive, but its application has not been liberal. Government has not shown its readiness to put into operation some of the invigorating provisions of the charter and we at any rate in this province have remained as dependent as we were before. But it is no good complaining of the past. Let Government take its cue from these and fearlessly mould its policy. In doing this it would be necessary to take note of the fears expressed and the objections raised by those who have been leading the opposition. Their first fear is that should Government close its existing institutions in one or more places, no public bodies can be found to step into the shoes of Government. This fear is not quite unfounded, but it is not insurmountable either. It would be quite possible to constitute by an Act of Legislature small local bodies of influential men to whom the management of educational institutions can be entrusted. Every high school should be placed under a committee consisting, say, of five members whose duty it should be to superintend the working of the high school. Government should consent to pay as a grant-in-aid for the maintenance of the institution the amount of money at present spent upon it from Provincial funds, the deficit being made up from fees and other sources. This Committee should be elected by the intelligent class of voters who are most intimately interested in the maintenance of the high schools. What at present happens is that the intelligent class of people raise a cry against the abolition or transfer of a high school or college, but when the time comes to put their hands deep into their pockets they keep back. When educational committees are constituted they will have to co-operate with Government in finding funds. As a compensation for the responsibility they will have a hand in the management of the institution over which they at present have no control whatever. Where such legally constituted bodies exist, the first step to take would be to transfer the management only. Money responsibility may rest with Government. In any case in which a school or college is transferred to a society, Government should keep to itself the powers of control. These powers will reserve in favour of Government the right of superintending the society and appointing one or more individuals as trustees for managing the institution for such time as Government may think proper. Such a provision will leave no room for suspecting that Government would not step in in case of failure. The committees that may be existing or called into being would be auxiliaries of Government for a few years during which, if they show sufficient vitality, they may be entitled to have their independent existence recognized and can claim from Government a land grant the annual income from which shall be equal to the amount of the Provincial grant. These are the sort of bodies contemplated in paragraph 62 of the Despatch, and should Government perform its long-neglected duty now, we think that the opposition that is at times set up against the transfer of schools will be silenced. The spirit of dependence which has for a very long time been encouraged or at least tolerated has incapacitated us for self-help, a result for which Government alone can be held responsible.

Private educational enterprise at Kárwár and the attitude of the Government Educational officers in the Kánara District towards it.

41. The Kannadă Suvárte (141), in its issue of the 8th February, writes:—It is an open secret that private school enterprise in North Kánara is not viewed with friendly eyes either by the Educational authorities of the district, or by the staff of the Kárwár High School. The teachers of the high school perhaps regard these private institutions as so many rivals and endeavour their utmost to put them down. But why the representatives of the Educational Department bear hostility towards them it is difficult to understand, unless the cause were to be ascribed to caste hatred which unfortunately prevails in its full extent in this district. The hatred or rather the prejudice, to put it in a mild form, of the representative of the Educational Department in Kánara did not, it is said, escape the notice of our lynx-eyed Governor during his late visit to the private school at Honávar. His Excellency Lord Reay while examining the boys asked the Deputy Educational Inspector to see whether the answers given by them were correct. But this gentleman, it is said, found the whole lot of boys to be only partially correct and to give only the substance of what they read! "What more should I expect from them?" or some such remark from the august Examiner, it is said, at last obliged the Deputy slightly to change his opinion. And when the managers of the school applied for grant-in-aid, His Excellency expressed great surprise that such a well-conducted school should not have been yet allowed any grant, and asked the Deputy to remind him of the fact before he left Honávar. But public opinion is divided on the point whether His Excellency was reminded of this fact at all. Many persons nod their heads in grave suspense and say that in the bustle of the hour the Deputy might have forgotten the whole matter! It is also whispered here that His Excellency, soon after leaving the private school, while talking to an ecclesiastical gentleman resident at Honávar for a long time and who has himself some experience of the benevolent administration of the Educational Department in Kánara, asked him repeatedly what could be the cause of such a well-conducted school not getting any grant yet. What answer this Reverend gentleman gave is not known. It may not be out of place here to say that though the managers of the school have applied several times to the Educational authorities for grant-in-aid, they have not been successful as yet. It is worth one's while to examine the way in which the administration of the Educational Department is carried on in this benighted district.

The Bombay University and the publication of a supplementary list of successful candidates at the last Matriculation Examination.

42. The Gujarát Darpan (76), in its issue of the 14th February, writes:—Fifty-five additional candidates were declared on Thursday last to have passed the last Matriculation Examination of the Bombay University. The degrees have already been conferred, the University Convocation is now almost an event of the past, and the fact that these candidates have now come to satisfy their examiners shows us without argument that there is a screw loose somewhere in the internal administration of the Bombay University. If the authorities had to grant them grace marks or to re-examine their papers, they ought to have done it at that time; but this delay is as unprecedented as it is unaccountable. Such an action is calculated to make the minds of the people uneasy. The authorities would have done well if they had given the reasons to justify the course they have taken. Our University should try in every way to be, like Cæsar's wife, above suspicion. [The Kaiser-i-Hind (111) of the 10th and the Gujarát Gazette (77) of the 14th February also say that the publication of this supplementary list of successful candidates shows the prevalence of mismanagement in the University and that it is disadvantageous to the students. The Gujarát Gazette remarks that the Government ought to warn the University authorities and that the complaints hitherto made about the Matriculation Examination do not appear to be groundless. The Vártáhar (19) of the 10th and the Dnyán Prakásh (11) of the 11th February ask who is responsible for the loss suffered by these 55 candidates, some of whom had already rejoined the schools and some entered Government or other service, and observe that it is most unbecoming to the Bombay University that so much darkness should prevail in the management of its affairs and that the people should lose confidence in the results of its examinations. The Sudhárak (17), in its issue of the 11th February, while commenting upon the mismanagement of the Bombay University affairs, expresses surprise at Dr. Peterson's re-election as Registrar of the University when it has been proved that on account of his multifarious other duties he cannot properly attend to his work as University Registrar, says that he should not persist in remaining in this post and that the University Fellows should not re-elect him when he cannot properly manage University affairs even with the help of an active and intelligent Sub-Registrar like Mr. S. R. Bhándárkar, and hopes that Dr. Mackichan, the new Vice-Chancellor, will soon remove the present mismanagement.]

43. The Subodh Patrika (16), in its issue of the 10th February, writes:—The University authorities quietly and without any explanation declare that fifty-five 'additional' students have passed the last Matriculation Examination. If this result were due to an unavoidable accident, it would need no comment though the infliction of undeserved disappointment and hardship to so many hard-working youths calls for an expression of regret; but we do not believe it was the result of an accident pure and simple. These students are all Hindus and so it is plain their miseries proceeded first from the peculiar idiosyncracy and unreasonable obstinacy of the Sanskrit Examiner who first set an unconscienably hard paper and then refused to make allowances for it in assessing the results, for had he done the latter, not only would his own public condemnation have been avoided but the poor students too would have been spared mental distress and some time and money. In the next place the authorities ought not to leave such a large number of students to the whim or caprice of a single examiner; in former times we believe there used to be always two examiners, so that the aberrations of the one were checked and corrected by the other. The third cause is the abolition of the system of granting grace marks. It is believed that this was done because one set of examiners abused the principle, but the principle was undoubtedly sound as it tended to obviate palpable injustice by checking and correcting errors or defects in the valuation of answers which a human examiner might be expected to commit in going over a large quantity of work. It should not have been therefore sacrificed, but measures should have been taken to prevent the abuse. We believe that it was once a practice to get all such cases discussed and settled at a meeting of the Syndicate with the aid of the examiners. Such a practice leaves little room for any abuse and ought therefore to be revived. The Matriculation, however, was not the only examination in which an undue severity was exercised. In the second examination in Medicine the students fared as badly, as all but nine out of some sixty-five were plucked. Why have the authorities refused to right their grievances?

Suggestions in connection with the Rájkumár College, Rájkot.

44. In a news-letter the Rájyabhakt (124), in its issue of the 12th February, says:—Not only the people of Káthiáwár but His Highness the Ráo of Cutch and some of his officers also entertain a low opinion about the system of instruction in the Rájkumár College, Rájkot. The Ráo has withdrawn Kumár Kálubha suddenly from the College and His Highness the Rája of Dhrángadra is now trying to withdraw his heir-apparent, who has already had two children. The paper then suggests that the age-limit of nine years fixed for the sons of Native Princes joining the College should be increased and that for leaving it should be reduced from 18 to 16, and that the students should be allowed to marry earlier than after attaining the age of 18 or 20 years, and recommends Mr. Macnaghten, the Principal, to keep away from intriguing men.

Part IV.—Railways.

The "Golden Gang" on the G. I. P. Railway.

45. In alluding to the discovery of the "Golden Gang" on the G. I. P. Railway composed of European railway guards banded together for the purpose of robbing passengers of their luggage, the Jáme Jamshed (108), in its ssue of the 16th February, says:—It is rather strange that though the gang had been working for several years neither the Railway authorities nor the Railway Police should have been aware of its existence. Native passengers neglected to complain about the theft of their luggage simply to save themselves from the trouble involved in making a complaint. The Railway Police appears from the last year's report on that force to be overworked, and it is desirable that its strength should be increased, making at the same time an attempt to enlist intelligent men who should be attracted by hopes of early promotion in the service. Almost the entire body of railway guards on the B. B. & C. I. Railway are Natives and they discharge their duties to the satisfaction of their employers. The G. I. P. Railway authorities also ought to employ some Natives as guards.

Transfer of Diwán Navalrái from Hyderabad disapproved.

46. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 6th February, writes:—We are receiving many complaints against the mismanagement of affairs in Hyderabad. What was apprehended has at last come to pass. The transfer of Diwán Navalrái, who was the heart and soul of the town, has resulted in great disorder. The Collector has not as yet sanctioned the appointment of any other municipal chairman in his place. There is a strong rumour that Colonel Trevor is exerting his influence to get him back and that that is the reason why he has still kept the office of the chairman vacant. There may be good men capable of filling his place, but there is scarcely a single man in Hyderabad powerful enough to keep down the factions, which are sure to reduce local self-government, in the absence of Diwán Navalrái, to a miserable, if not hopeless, failure. We hope that the Commissioner will take the welfare of Hyderabad into consideration and transfer the Diwán to his former place.

Part VI.—Native States.

His Highness the Thákor of Bhávnagar and his liberality on the occasion of his birth-day.

47. The Rájyabhakt (147), in its issue of the 12th February, says that the liberality shown by His Highness the Thákor of Bhávnagar on the occasion of his birth-day is praiseworthy. He has, remarks the paper, made provision for meeting the lighting expenses of a Christian church, but not for preventing an increase in the fees levied from students in the Bhávnagar College. Encouragement is given to widows, but no scholarships have been founded for college students residing outside Bhávnagar. Mr. Sims has been presented with Rs. 50,000, but not a single pie has been spent on the relief of the Thákor's relatives. All this shows that the Thákor wishes that the newspapers should praise him for this vain fuss. Not only the Thákor, but his advisers also are to blame in the matter. It is more honourable for him to perpetuate his ancestors' names than those of His Excellency Lord Reay, Mr. Peile and other Europeans.

Remarks about the appointment of unfit persons as Extra Assistant and Assistant Commissioners in Berár.

1. The Berár Samáchár (3), in its issue of the 11th February, writes :—Now that the new High Court scheme is shortly to come into force in Berár, it may not be amiss to examine the system of Judgeships there. The system has been up to date, at any rate to all outward appearances, one of favouritism and influence. Persons of no proved merit or acknowledged ability are often put in as Extra Assistant Commissioners and Assistant Commissioners. In fact the degree of influence one may have with the Resident or with the Foreign Office at Calcutta determines his grade in the Commission as an Assistant or Extra Assistant Commissioner. If amongst men of equal ability a preference were shown on the score of some particular merit for holding office, that would be something capable of a reasonable interpretation. But when you see persons shoved in into the Commission—persons who ostensibly have nothing to recommend them for the post to which they are appointed—those outside the official ring cannot be blamed. They attribute the appointments to influence and favouritism. If we exclude such of our Extra Assistants as have risen through the lower grades of the service by sheer dint of labour, it will be found that the remainder of the rank and file of Extra Assistants is made up of recruits of the above stamp.

2. The Vaidarbh (2), in its issue of the 9th February, writes :—We trust that steps will soon be taken to appoint an officer to do the work of the Small Causes Court at Akola. The duty is at present entrusted to Mr. Davies in addition to his own duties; and however hard that officer may work it is hardly within the region of possibility that he can do the work of two judges. We noticed the other day that he sat till 8 P.M., much to the inconvenience of parties, witnesses and pleaders, and yet he was not able to do half of the work that was on the lists of both the courts presided over by him. He began the duty with Small Causes Court cases, of which there were 32; but had to stop in the middle for a criminal case in which there were 5 accused, defended by three learned members of the bar. This case, though it occupied over four hours, remained unfinished at the close of the day; while 5 Subordinate Judges' cases and 3 appeals in the other courts remained untouched, the parties in these cases having to go away unheard. The above is an illustration of the objectionable system which prevails in Berár of conferring plurality of appointments on one officer. We think that principles of economy are pushed too far when, as in this instance, they put suitors and witnesses to inconvenience and extra expense consequent on adjournments of cases that cannot be taken up on appointed dates on account of there being a paucity of judges. A further illustration is afforded of the inconvenience of vesting criminal and civil powers in one officer,—the two incompatible with each other, and yet, oh! yet, we cannot secure their separation!

An order issued by the new Commissioner in Berár to the Deputy Commissioners approved.

3. The same newspaper writes:—We learn that the new Commissioner has given the Deputy Commissioners to understand that every important order or remark that they pass must be written in their own handwriting and not in that of the Clerk of the Court or Head-Clerk. This is a step in the right direction and we earnestly hope that Mr. Plowden will see the reform brought fully into force during his régime.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Part I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

India's wailings under the British sway.

1. The Káthiáwádi (81), in its issue of the 19th February, writes:—India is sinking. There are many persons who steadfastly look on, but unfortunately there is not even one philanthropist in millions of men to save her with all his heart and might and to sincerely console her. There are many men who say that India is going deep into the abyss of debt, but there is not one person who is anxious to prevent it. This is very sad. There are men who know that India is losing her heroism and that of her dear twenty-five krors of people, but there are scarcely any who by their knowledge and skill can retrieve the loss. Hind and her brave sons have become emaciated in body, in mind and in riches. They are growing feeble day after day. There are many persons who witness this state, but persons who can detect the real internal disease and remedy it are nowhere to be seen. This is unfortunate. Hind, how much shall we weep for thee! The merciless Britons have no mercy for thee and for thy twenty-five krors of destitute children. Alas! What can be more grievous?

Dhulip Sing's manifesto against the British Government condemned.

2. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 17th February, writes:—Dhulip Sing is giving evidence of the childishness of his mind in harping on his grievances every now and then and in speaking of the great revenge that is to come. He becomes positively mischievous when he talks of the good-will of the Native States of India towards him. His mad assertions are likely to raise unnecessary friction and distrust between the Paramount Power and the Native Rájás. But probably that is exactly what he wants. We hope, however, that the Government of India will give no heed to his utterances. [Several other papers take a similar view and consider Dhulip Sing to be simply mad. The Gujarát Darpan (76), in its issue of the 17th February, remarks that England ought not in the least to be afraid of Dhulip Sing, but that she should be ashamed of the injustice done to him by her. The Kannadă Suvárte (144), in its issue of the 15th February, writes:—The unfortunate Mahárája Dhulip Sing has been a victim of British statesmanship, and it is no wonder that the utter disappointment he has met with in his attempts to have his just claims recognised has distracted his mind and unsettled his brains. The Mahárája on account of his long residence in Europe is incapable of understanding the vast change which has come over the people and the princes of India, and fondly hopes that he can easily rouse them against the British.]

The alleged order of the Secretary of State for India to the Bombay Government to pay Rs. 9,000 to Mr. Wilson as his costs in the Cambay case.

3. The Gujarát Mitră (79), in its issue of the 17th February, says that the Secretary of State for India, intoxicated with the pride of office, has acted quite partially in fining India in the sum of Rs. 9,000, which he has ordered to be paid to Mr. Wilson as his costs in the Cambay case. Though he regards Mr. Wilson to be innocent, the Indian public does not, remarks the paper, entertain the same opinion. If Mr. Shámráo, Diwán of Cambay, had brought a false charge against Mr. Wilson in order to ruin him, the European Commissioners who heard the case would have found the latter innocent, and he would have got not only his costs but damages as well from Mr. Shámráo. But such has not been the case. The Secretary of State's decision as regards the payment of costs is an additional blow to the Bombay Government. Where should one go to now for justice? If the whole case were to go into the hands of Mr. Gladstone and of Mr. Parnell, what an uproar they would make in Parliament! It is the business of the leading people of India and of His Excellency Lord Reay to place the case into their hands, but Lord Reay cannot do anything of the kind as long as he is in office. If His Excellency wishes, he can expose this disgraceful affair in London after retiring from his present post. The leading people here ought to have pamphlets published with the pecuniary help of Mr. Shámráo and to have them distributed amongst the members of Parliament, so that such an event may not occur again. If such shameless injustice be not stopped, great harm will surely be done hereafter. [Several other papers also write disapprovingly of the State Secretary's order in question. The Suryodayă (64), in its issue of the 18th February, remarks that if the Secretary of State sympathised with Mr. Wilson, he ought to have paid him from his own pocket instead of throwing the burden on India, and that it can safely be said that the only principle observed in the administration of India by the British is that "might is right."]

The Indian National Congress movement, and the alleged issuing of a private circular by the Government of India in connection therewith.

4. The Anonymous (89), in its issue of the 17th February, says :—The Sanjibani newspaper of Calcutta states that the Government of India have issued a private circular in which Magistrates are held responsible for any part which parties connected with Government and Government servants take in the Indian National Congress movement. This news is a great blow to the unity prevailing between the rulers and the ruled. Such a circular, which is painful to the people, ought not to have been issued by the Government of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne. If the news in question be correct, we confidently assert that its result will not be good. Sir Auckland Colvin merely expressed his own independent views about the Congress, and the whole presidency became excited thereby and the matter was commented upon throughout India. Private reports were called for from the Divisional Magistrates about parties connected with Government and Government servants attending the Congress meeting and the public openly expressed its displeasure at it. Such unpleasant events greatly excite the feelings of the people. If the statement made by the Sanjibani, which shows that the Government of India themselves have changed their attitude, be correct, how much will the public be excited?

Remarks on the attitude of police officers towards the Indian National Congress.

5. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 21st February, says:—Some Government officers are displeased to see the Indian National Congress flourish day by day. From a Madras contemporary we learn that the Police Commissioner there actually tried to interfere with the right of the people to hold public meetings by prosecuting the secretary of the Pachappa charitable estate for allowing a meeting to be held for the purpose of electing delegates to the Congress in the premises under his management. The secretary was even served with a summons, but the Commissioner seeing the folly of his action withdrew the proceedings. We wish that the case had been gone through and that a judicial decision had been obtained in the matter once for all, for some police officers make a bugbear of their supposed power in this matter. We do not think that the police can legally object to orderly public meetings.

Report about His Excellency Lord Reay's intention of resigning the Governorship of Bombay before the expiry of his term of office.

6. In noticing the report in the Overland Mail that His Excellency Lord Reay will resign the Governorship of Bombay before the expiry of the full term of five years, the Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 19th February, says :—It is feared that this report will turn out to be true. The Crawford case seems to have made a strong impression upon His Lordship's mind. His Lordship had no personal object whatever in ordering an enquiry into the accusations brought against Mr. Crawford, and undertook at some risk the task for the sake of the good name of Government and the purity of the Civil Service. The enquiry into the conduct of Mr. Wilson in the Cambay case was made with similar good intention, but the Secretary of State for India disappointed His Lordship. In connection with the Crawford case, the result of which is as yet uncertain, the European community and a large number of the Anglo-Indian newspapers have taken to making personal attacks on Lord Reay, and this is enough to disappoint His Lordship, whose affability and sense of justice are well-known. The people of this presidency have found in His Lordship a straightforward administrator and a well-wisher of the country, and if for the above-mentioned or some other reason His Lordship resigns office, they will be very sorry to lose him. Even under such a misfortune the people will have the comfort that His Lordship will not forget to be a friend of India, and to prove a good helpmate to Lord Ripon in England.

The decision of the Crawford Commission and the absurdity of the conspiracy theory.

7. Writing in refutation of the theory of a Bráhman conspiracy against Mr. Crawford, the Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 18th February, says:—As a most apt instance of the bad example set by some English and Anglo-Indian journalists, we draw the attention of the reader to the efforts which are being made just now to discredit His Excellency Lord Reay's Government, because that Government has been trying to vindicate the integrity and the incorruptibility of the British rule in India. It was to be expected that none would be more glad than these English and Anglo-Indian writers, who have been incessantly telling the Natives that the British Government is the best because it is the most virtuous, when the Bombay Government was honestly endeavouring, without any race or class bias, to find out if the conduct of Mr. Crawford had demoralised the administration in this presidency; but how has the Government been treated by these writers for its pains? From the first they have tried to discredit that Government. The Bombay Government had a formidable task before it. It was not an easy thing to discover corruption. It had to collect evidence and satisfy itself that corruption existed. It instituted enquiries, appointed European Civilians to examine persons who could throw light on the subject, and to test their evidence before submitting the witnesses for examination before a regularly constituted tribunal. But the writers we speak of, instead of giving the Government their moral support from the beginning, attempted to hamper it by charging it with harshly treating Mr. Crawford and by calling upon it to punish the persons who came to give evidence against him before his trial was over. And now what are they doing? They are trying to make out that Lord Reay's Government has lent itself to a huge Bráhman conspiracy, got up for the purpose of ruining Mr. Crawford. We should have said not a word about Mr. Crawford's guilt or innocence at this stage of his case, if his apologists in the English and Anglo-Indian press had preserved silence on the subject. But when we find that attempts are being made to prove to the English public that Mr. Crawford has been the victim of a Native conspiracy and that the Bombay Government has been aiding and abetting that conspiracy, we feel bound in the interests of truth and justice—aye, in the interests of the British Government itself—to raise our humble, but emphatic, protest against those attempts. It may be easy to set it all to the account of the corrupt character of Natives, because they are the ruled and the critics are the rulers. But, after all, facts are facts, and if one but dispassionately examines how Mr. Crawford has come to be put on his trial, he will find that the theory of a conspiracy against him is entirely baseless and absurd. For instance, if there is really a conspiracy against Mr. Crawford, why should the conspirators—that is, those who have come forward to give evidence against him—implicate themselves while implicating him? A number of Magistrates have deposed to having paid bribes to Mr. Crawford. If their object was to conspire against him, why should they conspire in such a manner as to compromise their own character while compromising his? Then again, why should they conspire against a man who, according to their statements, conferred on them the offices which they had sought? It is extremely improbable that these persons would come forward to ruin a man who had done them good,—to ruin him by admitting that they had bought their offices by bribing him. Besides, a conspiracy presupposes that the conspirators have some motive and are men likely to unite for the common purpose of ruining a man who has done them harm. What could be the motive of the Native witnesses against Mr. Crawford in conspiring against him? The men who made statements against him before the officers appointed by Government to make a preliminary enquiry into the matter do not belong to one particular caste alone. It is absolutely contrary to facts to say that the witnesses were all or mostly Bráhmans, for, of the many persons who made statements before Mr. Ommanney, besides Bráhmans (including all divisions or sub-divisions), about 35 were, we hear, Lingáyats, about 40 Maráthás (that is, non-Bráhman Maráthás), about 11 or 12 Mahomedans, about 13 Parbhus, and about 40 Gujarátis and Márwádis. Moreover, these persons come from different parts of the country and may be said to be scattered over nearly 12 districts. Take the four Native Chiefs who have, it is said, made statements in the matter. The Chiefs of Jath and Akalkot are Maráthás; the Bhor Chief alone is a Bráhman, while that of Janjira is a Mahomedan. Surely the theory that men of different castes, scattered over different districts, would combine for the purpose of ruining Mr. Crawford by admitting that they had bribed him can only be supported on the preposterous assumption that they were prepared to lose their own character for the sake of ruining Mr. Crawford's. What has or had Mr. Crawford specially done to incur the hostility of so many people of different castes and districts? No one has suggested that he had done anything to render him unpopular and to array so many people against him. There must be some motive for a hostile combination, and in the present case it is not even alleged that such a motive existed. Why, again, should Mr. Crawford alone more than all other civilians be chosen as an object of the conspiracy? Why have not the other Divisional Commissioners been charged with malpractices? There are among civilians in high office one or two who have made themselves highly unpopular by their administrative acts. Take, for instance, Mr. Pritchard. He has been very severely criticised for the rigorous manner in which he has administered the A'bkári Department. In the whole of the Civil Service in this presidency there is not perhaps a more unpopular man. Why has no one come forward to conspire against him? Nor is that all. When it is suggested that Mr. Crawford has been the victim of a huge conspiracy on the part of corrupt Natives to ruin him, the fact is forgotten that the work of collecting and sifting the evidence against him before submitting it to the Commission which has tried him was entrusted not to Native officers but to able, shrewd and experienced Europeans who belong to the very Civil Service to which Mr. Crawford belongs. Are we to suppose that European Civilians like Mr. Ommanney, Mr. Gamble, Mr. Baines, Mr. Lucas, Mr. Spence, Mr. Nugent, and Mr. Lee-Warner would easily allow themselves to be duped by Native witnesses when a countryman of theirs, a member of their own service, was charged with corruption? If there has been a conspiracy against Mr. Crawford, then surely it is difficult to explain why so many European civilians have joined it. Are we to suppose that they are not jealous of the reputation of their service, or that they can be easily gulled by Natives attempting to ruin a brother civilian? Mr. Ommanney, it must be said, has been the principal enquirer. He is not known to be partial to Natives. He has acted as a Magistrate for several years and may be said to be acquainted with the Native character. How is it that he came to believe in the statements made by Native witnesses against Mr. Crawford? Nay, the fact that Mr. Crawford himself in his petition to the Government of India prayed "that no member of the said Commission shall be a member of any of the services in the Bombay Presidency" shows that the Civil Service of this presidency was prejudiced against him. How is that prejudice to be explained? Assuming that the Natives wished to ruin him, why should members of his own service be prejudiced against him? In fact, if the theory of a conspiracy against Mr. Crawford is to be believed in, we must assume that the Civil Service of this presidency has been either so weak, so foolish, so much wanting in circumspection, and so unfair or so perverse and malicious as to encourage Natives to ruin one of its leading members. It comes to this, then, that if those who believe in Mr. Crawford's innocence and in the theory of a Bráhman conspiracy to ruin him are right in the view they take of this matter, the conspiracy is of a most curious character—without any motive; that the conspirators are a set of men, who have been so shortsighted as to implicate themselves merely to implicate Mr. Crawford; that the conspiracy is not confined to any one caste or to any one district but extends to men of different castes and creeds, scattered over 12 different districts; that very able European members of the Civil Service have either joined it or have been duped by it, and that for the purpose of convicting a European member of that same service of corruption! It is ridiculous to say that there could be a conspiracy under such circumstances. Those who believe in the theory ignore these circumstances, which render it extremely improbable that Natives would so much as think of conspiring to bear testimony against a high European officer and that experienced European Civil Servants would join or encourage the conspiracy. Why, long before any Native had so much as thought of bearing testimony against Mr. Crawford, the Government of Bombay had, it appears, suspicions against him, as will be seen from the following letter addressed to Mr. Crawford in 1874 by the Private Secretary of the then Governor, Sir Philip Wodehouse:—

To A. T. CRAWFORD, Esq.

Government House, Parel; 12th February 1874.

SIR,—In reply to your letter of January 2nd, 1874, and in reference to a communication from Mr. Leslie Crawford, Solicitor, dated February 3rd, 1874, I am now directed by His Excellency the Governor in Council to communicate to you the decision at which the Governor in Council has arrived on your application to serve this Government in some suitable appointment. The only point which His Excellency considers it necessary to take into consideration is whether the pecuniary embarrassment in which you were alleged to be involved was so great as to be likely to cause the scandal of public proceedings or endanger your official independence. On this point His Excellency is of opinion that the deed of agreement entered into between your creditors and yourself satisfies the condition for which he has stipulated, and that this Government may now, when an opportunity offers, avail itself of your acknowledged abilities and experience. It has been stated in Bombay that there is some probability of your obtaining employment in Bengal, and His Excellency in Council is decidedly of opinion that for other reasons such an arrangement would be preferable to your completing your term of service in this presidency.—I have, &c., (Signed) W. LEE-WARNER.

This letter was put before the Commission which has tried Mr. Crawford and forms part of the evidence. It shows that in 1874 the Government of Bombay was of opinion for "other reasons" than his indebtedness that it would be better if he severed his connection with the Government in this presidency and found employment elsewhere. Was there a conspiracy against him then too, and did Natives conspire against Mr. Crawford so as to induce Sir Philip Wodehouse's Government, which was by no means partial to Natives, to pen the above-quoted letter? We have said all this because it appears that an attempt is being made in certain quarters to create an agitation in favour of Mr. Crawford in England and to make out that Natives have conspired to ruin him by concocting false charges against him. The British rule in India is founded on the principles of integrity and incorruptibility of administration, and, as we have more than once said in these columns, the right of the English to rule over us depends not on their bayonets but on their strict maintenance of, and rigid adherence to, those principles. If in the observance of those principles the Government becomes lax, it then loses its right. The sword may conquer territories and subjugate people; but the maintenance of that which has been conquered depends more upon the moral superiority of the rulers than on the number of their soldiers. And it is not mere professions of morality, not mere make-believe integrity of administration, that can or will make the British rule in India endure. Natives are shrewd judges of character and can easily discern mere professions as distinguished from acts. Anglo-Indian writers, who wish to save Mr. Crawford and to sacrifice Natives, may succeed in imposing upon the English public by leading it to believe that the latter have conspired to ruin the former. But after all, if Englishmen are jealous of their prestige, they must remember that it is the people of this country who must be satisfied by acts showing that the British administrators are prepared to maintain the administration free from even the suspicion of corruption. Race pride and race interests may lead Englishmen to wink at the sins of their countrymen in office and to denounce Natives as a set of false accusers. But if Englishmen are jealous of their moral superiority, their duty is to vindicate it by giving their support to those responsible administrators who are honestly trying to render the administration so pure as to be beyond the suspicion of corruption. We want the British rule in India, because under it we enjoy manifold blessings, one and not the least important of which is that it allows not even the breath of corruption to pollute its administration. When the Government is trying to expose what had become a scandal, every loyal subject is bound to support it without allowing race bias to mislead him. It is no doubt easy to condemn Natives and it may be easy to get the London Times and the St. James's Gazette to say that not Mr. Crawford but the Native Magistrates have been corrupt. But, after all, such tactics will not enhance the reputation of the British rulers or lead Natives to repose confidence in their desire to govern this country with an eye to justice and morality. It pains us greatly to find that English writers, who ought to be proud of the courageous manner in which the Government of Bombay is endeavouring to clear the administration of all suspicious elements, are resorting to a way of writing which is making people ask, "Are these the Englishmen who tell us that their Government is the best we could get, because it is pure?" To us it is a matter of indifference whether it is a Native or a European who is found guilty of corruption; but when attempts are made to whitewash Mr. Crawford at the expense of Natives, we feel bound to warn those who make such attempts against the demoralising example they set to the people of this country by trying to discredit the Government of Bombay because it has risen equal to the occasion and is honestly and fearlessly trying to prove that under British rule even the suspicion of corruption will not be tolerated in a public servant, be he an Englishman or a Native.

8. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 17th February, says:—The conspiracy theory is so absurd on the face of it that we cannot conceive how the Commissioners could have entertained it even for a moment. We should have rejected the rumour which ascribes this theory to the Commissioners as an idle one, had it not been for the serious manner in which the Commissioners argued it with the Advocate-General at the time of the latter's final address. If, as we are informed, about 500 people of all castes and creeds have testified to the alleged irregularities of Mr. Crawford, that fact is sufficient to stagger any faith in this theory. How can we reconcile the theory thus seriously propounded with the oft-expressed opinion that the Native community is so divided by internecine quarrels as to make its general union on a common platform an almost hopeless task? It would be also interesting to learn how the Commissioners have found an adequately strong motive for such a conspiracy. It is far from our mind to accuse the Commissioners of any conscious unfairness. What we wish to point out is the incompleteness of the enquiry before them and the necessity for the Governor in Council deciding the matter in the light of things that did not come before the Commission. There is a heavy responsibility resting upon the Government. It was they who appointed the Commission; it was they who out of deference to the wishes of the accused asked that the Commissioners should be officials belonging to the other presidencies; and if the Commission has failed to adequately fulfil the purpose for which it was appointed owing to a want of local knowledge and other circumstances, it is the Government who must supply the defect. That the Government of His Excellency Lord Reay, which has already shown a remarkable firmness and a steady desire to act fairly and in strict accordance with principles of justice and equity, will be able to meet the responsibility that now rests upon it, will be readily granted by those who have not allowed themselves to be blinded by prejudice. [The Kesari (39), in its issue of the 19th February, expresses similar sentiments.]

The conspiracy theory considered absurd and the action of Lord Reay's Government in the Crawford case defended.

9. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 17th February, writes:—We are greatly pained for the sake of British justice and honour to see some of the newspapers in England and in India, which pride themselves upon being the exposers of public and private iniquities, find fault with His Excellency Lord Reay and his Government for the action they have taken with reference to Mr. Crawford. It is surprising to see some of these models of journalism ascribing unworthy motives to His Lordship, and hinting that he has lent his powerful assistance to a conspiracy of Natives who aimed at the downfall of Mr. Crawford. Indeed the theory of a conspiracy, even when confined to the actual witnesses for the prosecution, is absurd enough, but when it is sought to connect the name of such a high-minded and independent statesman as His Excellency Lord Reay with the conspiracy, it becomes most stupendously so. Although nothing can be said with regard to the case so long as the Commission's report has not been made public, yet for ourselves we cannot see how it will be possible to disbelieve all of those witnesses who came before the Commission and deposed to Mr. Crawford's corruption. But whatever the decision be, the public will always owe a deep debt of gratitude to Lord Reay for having boldly pointed his finger at the great blot on the British administration. Even supposing that nothing more was brought before the Commission than what Mr. Crawford himself confessed to, is that itself not enough to justify the action taken by the Bombay Government? The attempt made in some quarters to throw dirt on Lord Reay is similar to the process of spitting at the sun.

10. The Sudhárak (17), in its issue of the 18th February, says:—It is very amusing that the affair which has been rotting for many years past in private and the unbearable stench of which has led the Bombay Government to courageously bring it to light and to get it investigated by a Commission of three select gentlemen at a cost of Rupees three lákhs and a half should, after all, turn out to be not rotten, but should prove those who averred it to be such to be liars and givers of false evidence. There have been hitherto many officers of the rank of Mr. Crawford and there will be many more too. But, not to say what may take place in future, it must be acknowledged that the intriguing Bráhmans of Poona have never up to this time brought false charges against high officers in the Government service. Of course the members of the Crawford Commission must have given satisfactory reasons why these Bráhmans should have been displeased with poor Mr. Crawford alone; for, however guardedly one may write, there appears to be no objection to say plainly that the Commission has found Mr. Crawford not guilty on the charge of corruption, as otherwise the English papers would not have written so explicity without being contradicted. In connection with the finding of the Commission, we have only to say that though hundreds of commissions may find Mr. Crawford not guilty, Native society, some of the members of which have either willingly or otherwise dealt immorally with him and some of whom had known more or less of this immoral dealing before it came to light, will never believe that Mr. Crawford was pure like washed rice and that intriguing, jealous and scheming people have by their inherent cruelty caused the sun of his lustre to be eclipsed for a time. The giving and receiving of bribes for places of clerks, head clerks, shirastedárs and Mámlatdárs is a matter of comparatively recent date. But before that, were there not many troubles in which Mr. Crawford was involved, such as those concerning the Bombay Market, Mrs. Tucker, indebtedness, &c.? The people could not, however, for some reasons, move against him, and his misdeeds would have remained in the dark if those causes which since April last have somehow or other combined together had not brought them to light, and Mámlatdárs like Dabir and Sindekar, agents like Hanmantráo and Mr. Crawford would all have passed off for good gentlemen and would not have acquired that immortality which they have done now. By all this we do not mean to say that anything undesirable has taken place. We are of opinion that there would be nothing amiss if the Bombay Government spent Rupees three lákhs and a half more on the hunting out of the whole truth in the matter. Such expenditure will be recouped hundred-fold in the future, and even though in such matters some families and races may come into discredit, it is necessary that a dutiful and responsible Government should sift the whole thing. If, as the English newspapers assert, the Commission has found Mr. Crawford not guilty on the theory of a Bráhman conspiracy, it must be said to have disregarded the fact of Mr. Crawford's indebtedness and his attempt to run away after he was suspended and the bearing of those facts on the matter in hand. Is it possible that the Commission was not struck with the question why Mámlatdárs, who are Governors in their tálukás and who are sensible and law-knowing men, should have submitted to harsh language and bad treatment at the hands of Hanmantráo, who had on account of his influence with a Divisional Commissioner become very proud and overbearing, and should have paid money to him out of their deposits in banks or by drawing loans without the hope of anything great? If on the payment of cash the cancelment of transfers, the obtaining of leave and the appointment to mámlats and shirastedárships had not been secured at once as a matter of certainty, would men like Dabir, who is pronounced even by Mr. Latham to be stupid, have paid thousands of rupees to Hanmantráo for nothing and by deposing to the payment of bribes made themselves and their families and friends the object of public ridicule and infamy? In short, if in accordance with the finding of not guilty alleged to be arrived at by the Commission the case against Mr. Crawford is decided in his favour, the whole Native community in this presidency will pity the Bombay Government and will despair of justice in a case in which a high European officer is involved.

11. In its issue of the 18th February, the Indu Prakásh (12), which sees nothing surprising in the Commission of three Anglo-Indian officers appointed to enquire into the case against Mr. Crawford finding him not guilty of a comparatively minor offence of bribery when it is remembered that even the British Parliament acquitted Warren Hastings of more heinous offences though he confessed to them and was prosecuted by an eloquent advocate like Edmund Burke, advises the British rulers of India not to busy themselves any more with the trial of cases of offences committed towards the natives of India as they are enormously costly and only serve to expose the English people to public ridicule for their partiality and vainglory of justice, and to bring into discredit courageous and upright men like His Excellency Lord Reay. It calls into question the soundness and reasonableness of the theory of hundreds of Natives of various denominations and ranks conspiring without any motive to ruin Mr. Arthur Crawford, and regrets that the Crawford case should end disastrously for the Natives and that no Native gentleman like the Hon'ble Mr. Mandlik, Mr. Ránade, Mr. Telang or Mr. Phirozsháh M. Mehta should have been appointed on the Crawford Commission with a view that both the sides of the case might have been fully placed on record in the cause of history. [The Dnyánodayă (10), in its issue of the 21st February, writes:—The Commission on Mr. Crawford has not yet reported, but it is rumoured that he will be acquitted of corruption. It is also said to be the opinion of the Commission that there has been a conspiracy of Bráhmans against Mr. Crawford. We think it a little too early to discuss seriously the report of the Commission on the strength of mere rumours, even though we are informed that its opinion is an "open secret." We think, however, that the idea of a conspiracy is manifestly absurd. Mr. Crawford has not made himself unpopular with the people, and there could be no such widespread conspiracy without some very evident cause for its existence being known. We cannot think the Commissioners will be so blind as to seriously advance such a theory, and we are not inclined to believe that they have done so until we see it in black and white. In a case like this, where the witnesses to the crime of receiving bribes are those who are guilty of the crime of giving them, and where they must naturally have said as little as possible to criminate themselves, the difficulties of getting at the whole truth have been great, and it is just possible that the Commission may feel that the charges have not been adequately proved, but we have no hesitation in saying that it will be a great scandal if he be allowed to escape scot-free. The Government of Bombay have had a very difficult task to perform, and in purifying the public service they should receive the hearty support of the people.]

Mr. Crawford and the Poona Bráhmans.

12. Writing about Mr. Crawford and the Poona Bráhmans, the Pratod (52), in its issue of the 18th February, says that it is simply mean to say that the Bráhmans have conspired against Mr. Crawford with the object of ruining him, that if they had been ill-disposed towards him his ruin could have been accomplished in no time by Mr. Pendse and others, who however are not so mean and intriguing as they are alleged to be, and that the fidelity and the benevolence of the Bráhmans are amply illustrated by the examples set by Hanmantráo and others in favour of Mr. Crawford.

Public opinion in India about the Crawford case.

13. The Vrittadhára (69), in its issue of the 21st February, remarks:—Some English newspapers say that some Natives have maliciously brought a false charge of corruption against Mr. Crawford and that His Excellency Lord Reay has abetted these wicked people. Those who have a knowledge of the Crawford case know how far these allegations are true. No man of sense will acquit Mr. Crawford on the evidence that came before the Commission. The Commissioners may be only ashamed to pronounce one of their own people corrupt, for there is not the least doubt that they must have been convinced of the guilt of Mr. Crawford. Race feeling is very bad, and once it takes hold of one's mind it makes him turn falsehood into truth and vice versâ. Both the young and the old in this country are quite satisfied about Mr. Crawford having made money by unjust means, whatever the Commissioners may say to the contrary, and the people are praising His Excellency Lord Reay for gratifying the goddess of justice by exposing the corruption of Mr. Crawford. To find fault with His Excellency on this account is as wise as spitting towards the sun.

Comments on the remark of the Calcutta correspondent of the London Times regarding Native Magistrates.

14. The Pratod (52) of the 18th February is much offended by the remark of the Calcutta correspondent of the London Times to the effect that a special commission should be appointed to inquire into the conduct of the corrupt Native Magistrates who have given evidence in the Crawford case in order to restore the confidence of the public in the subordinate administration of justice, and says that the Natives are fully alive to the ruinous and uncertain character of the present system of judicial administration, that if a mixed commission of Natives and Europeans with equal numbers of members of both the communities be appointed it will find out corrupt Magistrates in the proportion of one European to four Natives and will discover those Europeans who swallow large amounts of money in the Political and other departments, that though His Excellency Lord Reay is found fault with by Europeans of low mind for bringing to light the corruption of the adulterous Mr. Crawford, yet His Lordship is highly esteemed by the Native public and is regarded as one of those magnanimous Englishmen who are exceptions to the ordinary run of Englishmen, that it is as unreasonable to judge of the whole Native magistracy from a few members of it as it is to calumniate the whole covenanted service because a few of its members have been convicted of corruption, and that the bribery of Mr. Crawford has been demonstratively proved to the general public, whatever judgment may be passed by those in power to the contrary. [Many other papers write on this matter and bitterly complain of the attitude taken up by the English press towards the Natives and the Government of Bombay, and say that His Excellency Lord Reay has done only what was necessary in giving assurances of indemnity to the Native Mámlatdárs who gave evidence in the Crawford case. The Jagadádarsh (34), in its issue of the 17th February, says:—It is not desirable that Bráhmans should now be an eyesore to all. If they had not come forward, no evidence whatever could have been produced before the Commission, and the case would have remained in the background.]

The London Times on the Crawford case.

15. In noticing a Reuter's telegram stating that the Times of the 20th February condemns the action of the Bombay Government in withholding the decision arrived at by the Commission from Mr. Crawford, the Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 22nd February, says:—In connection with this subject the London Times, the Pioneer and other Anglo-Indian newspapers have made such an excited and unjust attack on His Excellency Lord Reay that similar conduct on the part of the Native press would have been condemned by them as disloyal and deserving of being held under restraint. The object of these Anglo-Indian organs and their London contemporary is evidently to confuse His Excellency Lord Reay by raising side-issues, to place him before the English nation in a disagreeable light, and to allow the enquiry into Mr. Crawford's conduct to be left incomplete. The aim of these newspapers is evidently selfish and improper. The Native public has found in Lord Reay a straightforward and good-natured administrator, who has always taken the middle course in order to avoid incurring the displeasure of the Anglo-Indian press, and in doing so has sometimes neglected to attend properly to Native interests, to wit, in the case of the new Bombay Municipal Act, the ábkári administration, the recent educational policy, and the Salvation Army. Notwithstanding this, the Times and the Anglo-Indian press have been abusing Lord Reay, showing thereby that they do not wish that the Indian administrators should rule justly, but desire that their selfish interests should not be interfered with and that no enquiry whatever should be held into the conduct of their countrymen accused even of serious offences. But His Excellency Lord Reay may rest assured that he carries the regard and sympathy of the entire Native public, which duly appreciates his good and just conduct in the Crawford case.

16. In writing on the same subject, the Jáme Jamshed (109), in its issue of the same date, writes:—The Times unjustly denounces His Excellency Lord Reay for refusing to do what the Secretary of State for India is accountable for. The Times commits another blunder in pronouncing the entire Native magistracy worthless and untrustworthy, forgetting that black sheep are to be found in every community, which ought not to be condemned for the faults of a few. It is to be regretted that the Bombay Government should have yet done nothing worth mentioning in the case of the self-incriminating Mámlatdárs. It is really a bad policy to connive at the crimes committed by numerous persons in order to arrive at a distinct opinion in the case of a person accused of a certain crime. The self-incriminating officials may be exempted from punishment, but they ought not to be allowed to remain at their posts.

Attack made by some Anglo-Indian journals on the Bombay Government for their action against Mr. Crawford disapproved.

17. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 13th February, writes:—The air is thick with rumours of Mr. Crawford's acquittal. Of course, the Government is not bound to agree with the verdict of the Commissioners, but is free to decide independently. On the strength of this rumour a contemporary observes that the Bombay Government has made itself a laughing-stock of the people. Why and how, we cannot understand. Were not the informations, true or false, laid against Mr. Crawford sufficient to create a suspicion against him? Is every prosecution ridiculous which fails to convict? Some of the Anglo-Indian journals are unusually hard upon His Excellency Lord Reay. The difficulty does not end here. The re-trial of the corrupt officials has commenced. Never was a Government put into such a false position. In spite of the offered pardon of indemnity from prosecution, the Government finds itself powerless to arrest the course of prosecution taken up by a private citizen against the already pardoned officials.

Ganesh Náráyan Sáthe and his withdrawal from the scene.

18. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 17th February, writes:—It is said that Ganesh Náráyan Sáthe has been called upon to verify the statement he laid before Mr. Vidal against Dabir, Sindekar and others. But the notice issued has not been served on him yet. He has left Poona and will probably not return in a hurry. They say that he has been purposely removed from the scene by the same powerful hand by which he had been put forward. This story has an air of plausibility about it. The main object of Sáthe's sudden appearance as a lover of even-handed justice was to embarrass the witnesses who had to give evidence before the Crawford Commission. That purpose cannot operate now and so he is withdrawn. It will be interesting to see how the Magistrate disposes of the matter if Sáthe continues to keep away.

19. The Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 21st February, writes:—We understand that Ganesh Náráyan Sáthe, whose complaint against Sindekar, Dabir and others the District Magistrate of Poona was directed to entertain and proceed with according to law, is not now willing to proceed with his complaint. We are told that he has written to that effect to the District Magistrate. It seems as though the person at whose suggestion he first moved in the matter has now consented to pull the strings the other way. It would be interesting to know how this result, should it really turn out to be so, has been arrived at. The law-point involved in the summary rejection by Mr. Vidal of Sáthe's complaint having, however, been decided against Sindekar, Dabir and others in that unfortunate position, any one may be tempted to play the rôle of a friend of equity and even-handed justice, even though Sáthe may now withdraw. The sword is kept hanging over the doomed heads of these unfortunate men!

Rumoured appointment of Mr. C. B. Pritchard to the Bombay Executive Council regarded as a public scandal.

20. The Yajdán Parast (143), in its issue of the 17th February, writes:—The coming appointment of Mr. C. B. Pritchard, the odious ex-Commissioner of A'bkári, Bombay, to the Bombay Executive Council in place of the Honourable Mr. Richey proceeding to England on six months' leave is a public scandal, and the people ought to protest against it. The appointment of such an enemy of the poor subjects to a responsible post in the Council does not augur well for their benefit. We wish that the public would manifest its strong disapproval of the appointment in question and should let the Government know what a grave scandal it would prove. [The Pársi Punch (124) of the 17th February thinks that Mr. Pritchard has a long lease of life before him, and wishes that God may grant him good sense to enjoy it, and that outside Bombay, nay India. The Satyă Shodhak (58), in its issue of the 17th February, ironically remarks that the joy of the people can well be imagined when, while Mr. Caine, M.P., is crying himself hoarse to check the liquor traffic in India, Mr. Pritchard, who always tries to increase the ábkári revenue of Government, is about to enter the Executive Council.]

Nomination of Ráo Sáheb Vyankatráo Rukmángad Inámdár to the Bombay Statutory Civil Service approved.

21. The Satyă Shodhak (58) of the 17th and the Rámdás (55) of the 16th February say that Ráo Sáheb Vyankatráo Rukmángad Inámdár, B.A., LL.B., is an old, experienced and popular officer, and that every one in the Bombay Presidency will be glad to hear that he has been appointed a Statutory Civilian by the Government of India for the current year. [The Gujaráti (78) of the 17th February also approves of the appointment and remarks that it is a further proof of the special favour now being done by Government to the Karnátak.]

Mr. Edgerley and his appointment as Private Secretary to His Excellency the Governor of Bombay.

22. The Sind Sudhár (167), in its issue of the 2nd February, writes:—Mr. Edgerley, who was some time ago Acting Assistant Commissioner in Sind, has been appointed Private Secretary to His Excellency the Governor of Bombay in place of Mr. Monteath. Mr. Edgerley is an active, experienced and intelligent officer, and the people of Sind are very glad to hear of his promotion.

The Ratnágiri vatandárs and the judi question.

23. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 21st February, writes:—It is now a year and a quarter since the Ratnágiri vatandárs appealed to the Government of India against the unwarranted resolution of the Bombay Government in the Revenue Department, No. 6260, dated 16th September 1887, which deprived the poor Ratnágiri vatandárs of their time-honoured privileges, in contravention of all law and equity. The matter has been under the very careful consideration of the Government of India and has a special interest for the Ratnágirians. It however involves an element of general interest, inasmuch as it exhibits on the part of the all-powerful bureaucracy an altogether new departure in the field of injustice. Hitherto injustice was masked, now it is open. We nevertheless ask the Ratnágiri vatandárs to trust to the large-mindedness of the new Viceroy's Government. Even if the matter were to come back to the Bombay Government for reconsideration, and the Secretariat, putting by for a while its sense of omniscience, were to refer it to the Advocate-General, we feel certain that justice would be done. For aught we know, the aforesaid resolution is on the face of it illegal, and such an independent legal authority as the Advocate-General would of course guard against any executive bias, if the matter were at all sent back to the Bombay Government for re-consideration and the latter in its turn referred it to him for opinion.

Discharge of Private Swift at the last criminal sessions of the Bombay High Court commented upon.

24. The Gujaráti (78), in its issue of the 17th February, writes:—The last criminal sessions of the Bombay High Court was remarkable for more than one reason. The discharge of Private Swift, who was charged with deliberately shooting down a Native in the Ahmednagar Táluka, by a jury consisting of eight Christians and one Hindu, gives rise to the serious question if even in Bombay the jury system has proved a success. It is a pity that the jurors have not paid the slightest thought to the central fact in the case, viz., the inability of the accused to account for the disappearance of the dog which, according to the prisoner's story, was shot by him. If the prisoner's story were true, how was it that he did not point out the dog that he had shot to the sergeant who afterwards came to the spot where he had killed an innocent villager? Whenever the life or reputation of a European officer is concerned, there is of course some one to certify that the man bore an exceptionally good character. Private Swift was fortunate in having such a certificate, but then we had here the strange spectacle of a man with the best of credentials once deserting the army and going out on this occasion on a shooting excursion without leave. We do not know what considerations induced the jurors to disbelieve the guileless villagers who gave a plain and unvarnished story, which was, moreover, admirably sustained in the severe cross-examination to which they had been subjected. A similar story is related in a Secunderabad newspaper of a soldier shooting a villager while on his sporting expedition. We do not believe that such dangerous sports of European soldiers will ever end unless jurors discharge their responsible functions with that care and impartiality which ought always to characterise persons entrusted with the determination of momentous issues. Again, the presiding Judge seems to have taken a novel departure from the established practice of the Bombay High Court in examining the accused in the Byculla murder case in a searching manner. The strange termination of this case also proves how the determination of important questions involving life and death may depend upon the temperament, education and intelligence of the jurors and of the presiding Judge, or even upon some points of procedure which may be followed or not followed by the latter. In a celebrated murder case that was tried last year, the European prisoner was, we believe, specially asked to leave his case in the hands of his counsel to the great disappointment of almost all present in court, who were anxious to learn what explanation the accused had to give of the sad occurrence which is surrounded with mystery even up to this day. The observation of the Honourable Mr. Justice Parsons that but for his intervention the case His Lordship was trying would have terminated otherwise, rouses awful and profound reflections in one's mind. But after all, with the imperfections of human institutions, it is better that a guilty man should escape than that an innocent person should be deprived of his life for the redress of social wrongs. [Some other newspapers of this week also have written bitterly complaining of injustice supposed to be done in the discharge of Private Swift by a European jury at the last criminal sessions of the Bombay High Court, and remark that in cases where Europeans are concerned failure of justice is as certain as anything.]

25. The Praja Mat (125), in its issue of the 16th February, observes:—Why do not Government pay attention to the conduct of those district officers who come to office at 12 and 1 and 2 P.M. when they summon suitors and witnesses to be present at 10 A.M.? The High Court Judges begin work at 11 A.M.; why should then the judicial officers in the mofussil act irregularly? If the latter be right in so doing, the summons should state the proper hour of attendance. Such a course will save much inconvenience to the suitors. Government should attend to the matter. Moreover, the district officers when they are on tour require the people to be present at their camp, but do not state in the summons the name of the village or the place where they may encamp. This arbitrary system ought to be given up and summonses should state the place where parties are required to attend.

A former Chief Constable and the present Hospital Assistant of Tásgaon and the Bráhmans of that place.

26. The Pratod (52) of the 18th February resents certain reflections against the Bráhmans of Tásgaon made in a correspondence published in the Bombay Gazette in regard to the prosecutions of a former Chief Constable and the present Hospital Assistant of that place, and remarks that those Bráhmans who have given evidence in these two cases are respectable and honest men though the High Court has on appeal acquitted the Chief Constable, and the trying Magistrate in the case of the Hospital Assistant has disbelieved the evidence of the Bráhman witnesses therein, that, as the Crawford case will bear out, the system of the British administration of justice has latterly become so strange that occurrences witnessed by millions of men are proved to have never taken place, and that though the Chief Constable and the Hospital Assistant have been found not guilty by the judicial authorities who tried them, yet they are guilty in the sight of the public.

The ábkári policy of the Bombay Government and a request to abolish the fee levied on the sale of toddy.

27. The Rást Goftár (83), in its issue of the 17th February, writes:—Mr. Caine's address must now open the eyes of the most bigoted partisan of Government. We have all along been unwilling to believe that Government aided and abetted the consumption of liquor in order to increase the revenue, though we have made no secret of our opinion that they always shut their eyes to the glaring mischiefs of the Pritchard system of ábkári administration. But after Mr. Caine's exposition of the facts of the case, we regret that we cannot come to any other conclusion than that Government stand in the eyes of all right-thinking people convicted of the charge laid at their doors. We have no desire whatever to be hard on the present administration, which has during the last three years evinced an unmistakeable desire to reverse the policy of its predecessors and to place the ábkári system on a footing more consonant with the feelings, means and habits of the people. We have noted with satisfaction the very necessary first step which His Excellency Lord Reay has taken in doing away with the toddy monopoly and in granting separate tapping licenses for drawing toddy. We hope that it is the earnest of a large and liberal measure of reform which will set the people's favourite beverage entirely free, and add to the many claims which Lord Reay has on the gratitude of the people of this presidency. As to the liquor farming system, we do not see that any great changes have been made or are in contemplation. The only alterations made last year in the Salsette farm, whereby the farmer is relieved of the minimum guarantee under which he was bound to sell at least a certain quantity and is left at liberty to sell his liquor at any price he chooses, have completely done away with all justification of the farming system. It is, we make bold to say, absurd to give a man the exclusive privilege to sell liquor, and to leave him to charge what price he likes for it. This is deliberately placing the people at the mercy of the farmer. The result has been that inferior liquor is sold dearer in Salsette than good liquor in the town of Bombay. This and other like consequences cannot but arise from a radically vicious system, and any tinkering of it, such as the Government of Bombay have from time to time adopted, has, instead of improving things, made matters worse. We hope that Government will muster up courage to overhaul the entire system, and to adopt the only rational system, viz., the sadar distillery system, which prevailed in Surat for a long time and which was set aside five years ago in favour of an influential farmer to the infinite disgust and injury of the people of the whole district. We have never charged Government with a deliberate desire to increase the revenue by an increased consumption of liquor without regard to all ulterior consequences. Such a desire is only worthy of a tyrant with a remarkably short political foresight. But we repeat that in the matter of ábkári regulations the Government of Bombay have shown a deplorable want of sympathy with the habits and means of the people, and have shut their eyes to some of the glaring mischiefs of their policy and have sown seeds of discontent which cannot but bear bitter fruit. The farming system with its numerous evils has been over and over again exposed. But it is a great pity that with all the good-will in the world, Lord Reay should have been powerless to set toddy free from the shackles with which it is bound up, and that Mr. Dántra's recent letter to His Excellency should have been at all necessary. Why, we ask in the name of common-sense, is a license necessary to sell toddy, after the payment of a crushing tree-tax and the issue of a tapping license? He is required to take out an additional selling license, as if it were that the taking out of a tapping license is not worry enough for the poor Bhandári. It appears that Government have no idea of the vexation one has to undergo, and of the greasing of the palm which one has to do, before he can obtain a license to do the most innocent thing in the world, in India. If they had had the idea, they would not have organized a separate ábkári department in each táluka, with a European or Eurasian lad, just out of school, over its head, and a couple of kárkuns under him, to scour the country to see that people do not drink enough of licit toddy to turn their heads. A separate department is a curse to the rayat. This letting loose of boy-inspectors and their staff have struck more terror in the hearts of the people. It is no wonder, then, that a very few licenses are taken out, and that while the consumption of liquor increases the consumption of the much more harmless toddy never comes up to anything like what it was before the new system came into existence. The supply of fresh toddy was most forcibly and unjustifiably suppressed in the year 1879, and at present not a tithe of the trees then tapped are used for drawing toddy. We say that this suppression of toddy was unjustifiable, because the only official justification urged has long since exploded. It was said that cheap and free toddy would mean illicit distillation of toddy-liquor. If this argument was sound, why was the tree-tax raised and the licensing and the public auction sale of toddy licenses resorted to in Surat and other parts of Gujarát, where toddy is never distilled but only used in a raw state? It is only in the Konkan that toddy-liquor is made. But even in the Konkan the experience of the last two years has completely demolished this official argument. The system of farming out the right to sell toddy has been abolished, and the tree-tax reduced to Rs. 10. With this reduced tax it would be a very profitable thing indeed to distil illicit liquor out of toddy. And yet the vigilance of the liquor farmers, aided by the ábkári department, has not been able to detect a single case of such distillation. This proves unmistakeably that it is not necessary to levy a heavy tax on fresh toddy and to prohibit the free sale of it, in order to protect the liquor revenue from unjust loss. The fact of the matter is that an embargo was put upon toddy in the interests of the liquor farmers in 1879. Since that time up to within the last two years the liquor farmers had had the monopoly of toddy as well as of liquor. They took advantage of the monopoly and abstained from drawing toddy in order to stimulate the sale of liquor, which was more profitable. The fact cannot be gainsaid that those who were satisfied with toddy were compelled for want of it to drink spirits. The evil became so patent in course of time that Government have just lately abolished the toddy monopoly wherever it existed, and reduced the tree-tax. The result has been a gain all round. Many trees have been taken up, giving to the people a much-needed and healthy beverage, and bringing in an unexpectedly large revenue to Government. One would think that this result of the wise deference paid by Government to outside criticism and agitation would lead them to relax more and more their hold upon toddy, to the infinite relief of their subjects and the certain increase of the revenue. The demands made by Mr. Dántra on behalf of the cultivators of Gujarát are very moderate indeed. He justly complains of the license fee levied on the sale, and as a temporary measure asks for its abolition. We hope that Mr. Dántra's request will be granted, and that Government will also see the pressing necessity for a reduction in the tree-tax, so as to make toddy available to those poorer classes by whom it is most needed. [The Kaiser-i-Hind (112) of the 17th and the Surat Akhbár (84) of the 18th February also wish that Government should reduce the severity of the ábkári laws as regards toddy. The Surat Akhbár suggests that the concession made by Government to the Káli Paraj tribe in the matter of toddy should be extended to other districts, that toddy should be allowed to be sold at the foot of the tree outside the city-limits, and that date-trees in cities in the compounds of residences should be allowed to be tapped, the fee being fixed at one or two annas per house.]

Complaint against the notice issued by the Collector of Thána in connection with the sale of mowra flowers.

28. The Rást Goftár (83), in its issue of the 17th February, writes:—We join the Bombay Gazette in drawing the attention of Government to a notification issued under the authority of the Collector of Thána prohibiting people from dealing in mowra flowers on pain of being prosecuted under Section 53 of the Bombay A'bkári Act. We cannot but characterize the proceeding as a very high-handed one. We fail to see why people who trade in mowra flowers and sell them openly, without any intention of making illicit liquor from them, should be threatened in this manner. The object of the Collector is, of course, to put down illicit distillation which is said to be going on in the country. But how is it, we ask, that illicit distillation was not heard of in this district before? The answer is not far to seek. It is the pernicious farming system, combined with the excessive price now charged for liquor, which has both created an appetite for drink and driven those who cannot afford to pay the high price now demanded to distil illicit liquor. The remedy then for the Government to adopt is to alter the system so as to remove the cause of the evil which is of their own creation, and not to put a stop to a legitimate trade in mowra flowers which has been carried on from time out of mind. We are afraid that the Collector of Thána has a very short memory, if he has forgotten the lessons of the mowra legislation of 1882. As we go to the press, we hear that there have been two cases already in Bhiwndi, in which people have been summarily convicted, their only offence being the possession of mowra flowers for trade purposes. [The Kaiser-i-Hind (112) of the 17th and the Káside Mumbai (113) of the 22nd February also wish that the Government of His Excellency Lord Reay should cancel the notification in question.]

29. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 18th February, writes:—A remarkable instance of a Civilian's contempt of public opinion and stretch of arbitrary power has recently occurred at Thána. Mr. Todd, the Collector, has issued a circular under the Ábkári Act making the possession of mowra flowers primâ facie illegal, and the possessor liable to a penalty unless he proves that the flowers were not meant for illicit distillation. Mr. Todd has at once carried out by an executive order what Sir James Fergusson's Government failed to do by legislation. The A'bkári officers, not to be behindhand of the Collector in their executive zeal, have issued notices in the spirit of the circular. The mischievous character of the circular and the notices needs scarcely to be insisted upon. Mowra flowers are as much an article of food and commerce as of distillation, and throwing the burden of proving their possession legal on the possessor must needs lead to great hardship. We cannot believe that the circular was issued with the cognizance of the Central Government, and we are sanguine that like Mr. Keyser's famous circular the present one will be withdrawn. But the mere issue of it under the nose, so to say, of the Government shows the need of a stricter supervision than at present obtains.

30. The Satyă Shodhak (58), in its issue of the 17th February, disapproves of the circular issued by Mr. Todd, Collector of Thána, against the possession of mowra flowers, saying that it would be practising oppression on the people who use these flowers as food if the circular were put into practice, and requests His Excellency Lord Reay to compel the Collector of Thána to withdraw it.

A suggestion to Government with regard to the collection of the land revenue this year from the agriculturists in the Sholápur-Bijápur District.

31. The Kalpataru (36), in its issue of the 17th February, recommends Government to duly consider the miserable condition of the agriculturists in the Sholápur-Bijápur District caused by the failure of crops this year and the ravages of wild pigs thereon, and to grant them remissions of land revenue and to have due regard to their convenience in collecting it this year.

Alleged severity in the collection of the land revenue in three villages of the Broach District.

32. The Broach Mitră (93), in its issue of the 20th February, says that though the people of the A'mdara, Sakhwád and Navetha villages in the Broach District petitioned Ráo Bahádur Chunilál Venilál, District Deputy Collector, to allow them to pay the land revenue next year owing to the failure of crops this year, their prayer was not complied with, that some have tried to comply with the order for payment by borrowing money from sáwkárs, and that those rayats who are unable to raise loans are in great stress.

Necessity for opening relief-works for the distressed poor in the Dohad sub-division of the Panch Mahấls.

33. The Satyodayă (132) of Dohad, in its issue of the 14th February, says that a great portion of the rayats and other people in the táluka have found it very hard to maintain themselves for about a month past owing to the failure of crops caused by scanty rainfall last year, that the Collector has seen many Bhils starving while coming from Jhálod to Dohad, and that he has generously given money out of his private purse to some of them, and hopes that he will have relief-works opened for the benefit of the distressed poor.

Construction of a dam to a river in the Gokák Táluka and its real object.

34. The Belgaum Samáchár (23), in its issue of the 18th February, says:—Six lákhs of rupees have been sanctioned for the construction of a dam to the river near the railway station at Dhupdál in the Gokák Táluka and the work has been commenced. It is said that the old dam being a small one the Gokák Canal does not get a sufficient supply of water. Thousands of acres of land along the river will have to be taken up for the purposes of the new dam. We have heard a strange thing in this connection. The chief object in constructing the new dam is said to be not to increase the supply of water to the Gokák Canal, but to supply water to the mill near the Gokák water-fall. The land in the vicinity of the river could not have been taken except in the name of the canal. One of the conditions agreed to between Government and the managers of the mill is that the former should supply to the mill as much water as it requires. This does not mean that Government should incur any amount of expenditure and provide the mill with an adequate supply of water even though it increased its operations. It simply means that as much water as the mill may require may be taken for its use from the water which naturally flows in the river. Without considering the matter properly Government are said to have at once ordered this costly work on receiving a complaint from the shareholders of the mill. Another circumstance, according to the rumour, which has led to this work is that many persons holding high positions in the Government service have shares in the Gokák Company, and hence this favourable but improper interpretion of a condition in the agreement. In order to dispel the doubts which the people entertain in this matter, we suggest to Government the advisability of publishing the agreement and the correspondence between them and the Gokák Company and a list of Government officers who may have shares in it.

Deputy Assistant Political Agents in Káthiáwár and the necessity for transferring them from their present places.

35. The Din Mani (74), in its issue of the 19th February, points out the advantages of not allowing Government officers to continue for more than five years in one place and the necessity for transferring Deputy Assistant Political Agents in Káthiáwár, who have already been there for more than five years, wants to know whether these men are excluded from the operation of the Government resolution prohibiting the continuance of Agency officers in one place for more than five years, calls the attention of the Political Agent and of His Excellency the Governor to the matter, and hopes that the officers in question will be speedily transferred.

Recommendation to appoint Ráo Bahádur Káshináth Mahádev Thatte as Huzur Deputy Collector at Násik.

36. The Gangálahari (30), in its issue of the 15th February, says that if Ráo Bahádur Káshináth Mahádev Thatte, District Deputy Collector, were appointed Huzur Deputy Collector at Násik as before, he would be able to effect many improvements in the city, and requests the authorities to consider this suggestion.

A Havildár in the Hyderabad District Judge Court levying perquisites from those who visit the court.

37. A correspondent, under the signature of Jhamatmal Vasanmal Gidwani, writing to the Sind Sudhár (167) in its issue of the 2nd February, says:—The Havildár to the District Judge of Hyderabad annoys petitioners considerably and levies perquisites from them by force. He stands at the court-house door with open mouth, ready to bite everyone who will not throw a morsel to him. Even though a man may belong to a low caste, if he gives 8 annas or a rupee to this Havildár he will be accommodated with a chair to sit in, while, on the other hand, a gentleman, though entitled to a chair in the Commissioner's Darbár, must stand unnoticed if he fails to pay the Havildár his customary dues. At times, when complicated cases come before the Sessions Judge, such as when a Government officer is being tried on a charge of bribery and well-known barristers and pleaders are engaged to conduct the case, the Havildár's importance and income increase considerably, because many persons come to witness the trial. He then levies several rates of fees for seats just as is done in a theatre. At times, illiterate persons may be seen sitting in the same row with pleaders. I too have come in contact with this man, and details of this particular case are given below. I happened to be a candidate for the pleaders' examination and was required to produce a certificate from the District Judge. With that object I presented an application to the Judge and he sanctioned it. When the necessary certificate was being given to me, the Havildár came in and demanded his perquisite from me, and on my telling him that I had no money at the time, he took back the certificate from me in the presence of the Head Clerk and the Munshis of the Court and said that until I gave him his customary dues he would not return the certificate. This provoked me, and when I used angry words to him he gave up the certificate to me. This is the way in which the District Court Havildár conducts himself. The reason why he behaves in such an unbecoming way is that he thinks that no Native would be so bold as to complain against him to his European superior, the District Judge. But I am certain that the Judge, who is a subscriber to the General Library, can be made acquainted with the conduct of this Havildár through the medium of the newspapers. I will not dilate further on this subject. There are several other persons who have been annoyed by this man, and if they fail to expose his misconduct I will describe it fully in the Sind Sudhár and in the English newspapers.

The sudden death of Mr. Náráyan Malhár Pátekar, Head Clerk to the Collector of Sátára, and a suggestion to Mr. Keyser, the Collector, with regard to the family of the deceased.

38. The Bodh Sudhákar (6), in its issue of the 20th February, notices the sudden death of Mr. Náráyan Malhár Pátekar, Head Clerk to the Collector of Sátára, praises him for his ability and intelligence, says that he was brought from Kolába to Sátára by Mr. Keyser, the Collector, who had a good opinion of him, and requests Mr. Keyser to mark his love for the deceased by making some arrangements for the proper maintenance of his old mother and wife. The paper hopes that like Mr. Mactier, a former District Judge at Sátára, Mr. Keyser will engage in the Government service one of the near relatives of the deceased and thus render indirect help to his family.

Outbreak of small-pox epidemic in Belgaum and the negligence of the local vaccinator and the municipality in discharging their duties.

39. The Chikitsak (25) of Belgaum, in its issue of the 20th February, says that the small-pox epidemic is raging fearfully in that city, that it has heard that the newly-appointed vaccinator does not do his work regularly and punctually and that the District Magistrate and the Deputy Sanitary Commissioner should attend to this matter, and requests the president of the local municipality, which it says is most careless in conservancy work, to look to the sanitation of the city.

Necessity of compulsory vaccination in Hyderabad (Sind).

40. A correspondent of the Sind Sudhár (167), in its issue of the 2nd February, writes:—Small-pox prevails to a great extent in the town of Hyderabad and many cases have proved fatal. It appears that vaccinated children have suffered less than those who have not been vaccinated. It would therefore be much better to make vaccination compulsory in the town of Hyderabad.

Opening of liquor shops and the residence of prostitutes on the roads leading to the Poona High School and the Tulsi Bág in Poona disapproved.

41. The Poona Vaibhav (49), in its issue of the 17th February, objects to the opening of liquor shops and to the residence of prostitutes in the vicinity of the Vishrám Bág Building of the Poona High School and on the road leading to the Tulsi Bág in Poona, on the ground of their exercising demoralising influences on youths attending the school and on respectable men and women passing by the said road, and recommends Government to compel the owners of the shops and the residences of bad women, if they do not voluntarily proceed in the matter, to eject their present objectionable tenants in the interests of public morality, and to segregate them in an out-of-the-way part of the city.

A gang of Beluchis in Kánara.

42. The Kannadă Suvárte (144), in its issue of the 15th February, writes:—We learn that the Beluchis or Afgháns, who were for the last several months wandering over the district of Ratnágiri, have now passed down to Kánara. Our correspondent informs us that the inhabitants of the village of Bankikodla were quite alarmed at the sudden appearance of some of these Beluchis in their village. Some ten or fifteen of them accosted a Kunbi on the outskirts of the village, and put him questions with a view to get some clue as to the dwellings and other particulars of its well-to-do inhabitants. The curiosity of the Kunbi was naturally aroused, who forthwith came to the village and spread the news to the great anxiety of the inhabitants. There is a police station at Gokarn some two miles off, where there are but a handful of sepoys who can but ill-afford to keep any strict vigilance over this gang. We, however, hope that the Police Superintendent of the district will keep a watch over these marauders and see that the people are not molested.

A complaint against some policemen in Kaira.

43. In a news-letter from Kaira, the Ahmedabad Times (86) of the 19th February says that sheep are being stolen there in large numbers, that the people suspect that policemen steal them for food, and that if this be true the Chief Constable ought to enquire into the matter and to take remedial measures.

Gamblers at Bársi, and a suggestion to the police in connection with them.

44. The Prabodh Ratnă (51), in its issue of the 21st February, says that many merchants coming to Bársi on business are cheated by gamblers and deprived of the money and ornaments they may have with them, that it has heard many complaints in this matter, and that the police authorities should bring these gamblers to book.

PART II.—Legislation.

Remarks in connection with the Bombay Village Sanitation Bill.

45. The Din Bandhu (7), in its issue of the 17th February, writes:—That the best of motives have actuated Government in proposing the Bombay Village Sanitation Bill goes without saying. The danger, however, is that owing to the ignorance and helplessness of the poor villagers they will be exposed in many cases to petty annoyances from which even the capable citizens of Bombay are not exempt, as Mr. Crawley-Boevey during his short but spirited tenure of office as Chief Presidency Magistrate made sufficiently clear to all in his judgments on Bombay municipal cases. Legislation is acknowledged to be a necessary evil everywhere in so far as it tends to impose restraints on the liberties of individuals. The grip perhaps is not felt so tightly where the nature of the bonds is understood, their utility appreciated, and where they can be relaxed when necessary—and this is where wealth and education have taught men what their individual rights are and how they are to be maintained intact. We have no doubt that Government will cautiously feel their way in gradually extending to villages, where absolutely necessary, the provisions of the Bill when it becomes law. We believe that in very few villages it will be necessary to introduce the Act even in its limited sphere of operations—as under sanitary committees. These open hamlets of the simple villagers are generally sufficiently isolated and too meagrely peopled to suffer from the baneful effects of vitiated air so common in crowded cities and towns where artificial aids of science are needed to make men live. It is in places where pilgrims congregate in considerable numbers that special precautions are needed to prevent outbreaks of epidemics which thence spread far and wide. These nurseries of cholera, small-pox and other infectious diseases near the principal shrines should be vigilantly watched. If the measures of the Bill are carried out vigorously in these centres of mischief, Government will have no occasion to interfere with numerous harmless villages.

PART III.—Education.

Disapproval of the proposal of Government to withdraw themselves from education in favour of private enterprise.

46. The Rást Goftár (83), in its issue of the 17th February, writes:—The Government policy in regard to education has now been enunciated, but the motives underlying it are not, perhaps, just those which have been openly avowed. The saving that can be made by giving over the management of certain schools to local committees is so trifling that we cannot understand, on grounds of financial economy alone, the anxiety of Government to get them off their hands. There are people who apprehend that the steps which the rulers are taking are ominous of a complete reversal, in course of time, of the beneficent policy declared in the time of Lord Halifax. The Government are in error in supposing (if that is what they actually believe) that the time is now ripe for handing over the general control and management of education to the people of the country. A recently published resolution declares in regard to lower secondary education that it is the policy of Government to retire in favour of private enterprise wherever it is possible to do so without injury to education. The qualification which is wisely admitted in the declaration of this policy may induce one to agree with it in the abstract. But who is to decide the question whether in a given case the retirement of Government will or will not be prejudicial to education? The almighty Government will, of course, be the sole judge, and we can say from experience that in such a matter the view which they will take will be often at variance with that held by the people, who are in no hurry to take upon themselves the management of education. [The Poona Vaibhav (49), in its issue of the 17th February, construes the proposal of Government to withdraw themselves from education in favour of private enterprise and the increase of fees in the Deccan College and in Government high schools to mean a desire to check the spread of education among the middle classes.]

The educational policy of the Bombay Government and its effect on the people in Sind.

47. The Sind Sudhár (167), in its issue of the 2nd February, writes:—At the Calcutta University Convocation on the 19th ultimo, His Excellency Lord Lansdowne, the present Governor-General of India, expressly declared that the taste which the people of India evinced for education had been created in them by the British Government and that therefore the latter would not now take any steps likely to discourage the cause of education. Inasmuch as it was the Viceroy himself who gave expression to such a favourable view in regard to education, we are at a loss to imagine how such an enlightened Government as that of Bombay can have passed an order to the effect that the cost of maintenance of Government high schools in the presidency of Bombay should either be reduced or that the fees now paid by boys in such schools should be increased. It will be observed that the course adopted by the Government of Bombay is in direct opposition to the views expressed by the Governor-General himself. The Governor-General has not the slightest wish to interfere in any way with the Educational Department. Only about a month and a half ago the Educational Inspector in Sind, acting under the orders of the Government of Bombay, wrote to the head-masters of the three high schools in this province, and asked them to state what steps they intended to take to give effect to the orders of the Local Government. It is now said that the question of increasing the fees has been finally settled, and that the enhanced rates will come into force from March next. We have already pointed out the disadvantages that are likely to arise from such a course. Universal regret is expressed at the enhancement of the fees, and general astonishment is felt at such an order having been passed under the rule of such a competent and intelligent Governor as His Excellency Lord Reay. At the last meeting of the Indian National Congress at Allahabad the question of education was inter alia discussed, and the meeting arrived at the conclusion that Government was bound to support education, and that if it could not at present devote more funds to education, it ought not, at any rate, to reduce the present expenditure. Mr. Telang, a well-known barrister of Bombay, who is one of the most prominent members of the Bombay Legislative Council, spoke at great length on the subject of education, and expressly said that the expenditure which Government at present incurred on education was comparatively insignificant. He added that Government ought to be ashamed of saying that it had no money to apply to the advancement of education. Government at present devotes only one per cent. of its revenues from India to the advancement of education, and this cannot be said to be too much. We can point out several items of unnecessary expenditure in the other departments of Government and they should be reduced. The Governments of other countries in Europe expend large sums of money on education. That of Germany considers that it is one of its most important duties to help every branch of education. Sind is still more backward in education than any other part of India. The people have only now commenced to realize that the establishment of the Sind Arts College will promote high education in Sind and will supply the keenly-felt want of educated men in the province. But if fees are raised the people will be sorely disappointed seeing that most of the boys will have in consequence to leave school and thus lose the advantage of education. The number of students in the College will also proportionately decrease. It is said that the fee of Rs. 5 will be levied from each pupil preparing for the 7th standard. This is the rate at which the College students pay fees. Can it be said that the training given in high schools is as good as that in the Arts College? Government ought to take all these things into consideration. The people are too poor to pay such high rates of fees. In these days it is hard enough for people to earn a livelihood, and if the rates of fees are raised they will be deprived of the benefits of education. The majority of the population consists of illiterate men, and if obstacles are put in the way of acquiring education, the number of such persons will considerably increase. His Excellency Lord Reay himself in his University Convocation speech said that superficial knowledge was dangerous. We therefore hope that Government will on no account sanction the proposal to increase fees. The Sind Sabha will also meet on Saturday next to consider the question of increasing fees in schools.

Ráo Sáheb V. N. Mandlik's election as Dean in Arts of the Bombay University for the current year approved.

48. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 21st February, writes:—We are extremely glad to note that for the first time in the history of our University a Native gentleman has been chosen for the high academic distinction of a Dean, and that the choice has fallen on our esteemed and learned townsman, Ráo Sáheb V. N. Mandlik. On Tuesday last the Ráo Sáheb was unanimously elected Dean in Arts for the current year in succession to the Honourable Mr. Justice Birdwood gone to Europe, on the motion of the Honourable Mr. Justice Jardine, seconded by the Rev. Dhanjibhái Nowroji. We heartily congratulate the Ráo Sáheb on the new distinction conferred on him. Apart from his public services outside the University, his services to that body alone for more than 25 years past in the capacities of examiner in vernaculars at the earlier examinations in Arts and at the LL.B. from 1868 to 1884, and Syndic in Law from 1873 to 1888, have been most valuable and fully justified the glowing eulogy passed on him by the Honourable Sir Raymond West at the University Convocation last year while announcing the offer of a sum of money by the committee of the fund that is being raised to commemorate his services, for the foundation of a scholarship, subsequently converted into a gold medal bearing his name. It is also worthy of note that with the exception of the Honourable Mr. Justice Bayley he is now the oldest Fellow of the University. Besides these services his literary works, especially on Hindu Law which are largely quoted both by the bench and the bar, eminently fitted him for this high honour, and we welcome it as a compliment to the educated people of this presidency. [Several other newspapers approve of the appointment of Ráo Sáheb V. N. Mandlik as Dean in Arts of the Bombay University.]

Remarks on the proposed changes in the Arts curriculum of the Bombay University.

49. In writing about the proposed changes in the Arts curriculum, the Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 21st February, observes:—Anybody, who looks around him and sees the poverty to which the people are being reduced and the policy of Government in the matter of higher education, will be convinced that the present is certainly the most inopportune time for any change calculated to throw additional obstacles in the path of the student world. This change, if carried out, will operate detrimentally to the interests of poor students especially, and will in all probability deprive the University of some of the best and most deserving students who will have as a matter of necessity to bid good-bye to all hope of higher education, and against them the portals of fame and wealth will be for ever shut. This will be deplorable indeed. No doubt the scholarships afford them some relief, but it is not sufficient to carry them through. We never dreamt of such a blow to poor students, when we knew that there were such men as Messrs. Telang and Modak on the committee. They from their position and past experience were expected to know the condition of these unfortunate students. But strange things often happen. Most ludicrous propositions at times emanate from men never supposed to be capable of being their authors, and, we submit, the present is one of such occurrences. Guided by their zeal for the cause of education they have for once forgotten the wants of the poor aspirants of higher education in this presidency. All honour to Dr. Peterson for his bold demur to the proposition. He fearlessly asserted that it was not at all advisable to extend the course, and that it was possible to secure all necessary improvements "without recourse to so radical a change." We are entirely of the same opinion. By a revision of the present course it will not be difficult to secure the amount of culture deemed essential in the possessor of a degree. It is all very well to talk of a large amount of general culture and so on, but how is it to be obtained? Surely not by creating additional obstacles in the pursuit of it. The very fact that a similar proposal was put forward and rejected in 1870 ought to have shown the committee the impropriety of its proposal. The argument that a course of four years obtains in the sister Universities of Calcutta and Madras need not necessarily hold good in Bombay, where it will work injuriously. We do not understand what the committee means by alluding to the "existing condition of educated society." We would have welcomed some additional light on this point. As to the opinion of College authorities in favour of the change, all we can say is that no reasons are assigned for it. We therefore hope that the Faculty of Arts will carefully consider the proposal.

Publication of a supplementary list of successful candidates at the last Matriculation Examination of the Bombay University commented upon.

50. The Gujaráti (78), in its issue of the 17th February, writes:—A large number of students have recently been declared to have passed the Matriculation Examination after more than a month and a half since the first result was published. Why the results should have been delayed so long, to the serious inconvenience of some who have been deprived of the benefit of lectures in colleges and to the painful anxiety of all, we are not in a position to say. As far as our information goes, the examiners had no voice in determining the fate of these candidates and the Syndicate has, we think, acted ultra vires in disregarding the specific instructions given to the whole body of examiners. One of the instructions ran as follows: "The Syndicate having decided that the system of giving grace marks should be done away with, Examiners who are colleagues are directed, in view of this change, to jointly consider before finally sending their marks to the Registrar, whether in particular cases candidates should or should not pass in their subjects, as the final decision will rest with them." The decision of examiners being final it is not open to the Syndicate to revise it, and as the examiners in this case were not consulted, the action of the Syndicate is directly in contravention of its own rule on the subject. During the Honourable Sir R. West's Vice-Chancellorship a similar question had arisen for consideration, but he referred the whole matter to the examiners, who granted a few grace marks to some candidates after holding a general consultation. As the action of the Syndicate is thoroughly unconstitutional in this instance, the results also are vitiated by that circumstance, and the general body of examiners are in duty bound to protest against the usurpation of its rights by the Syndicate.

Complaint against a male teacher in a girls' school in Kánara.

51. The Kannadă Suvárte (144), in its issue of the 15th February writes:—We have been in possession of information for the last several months concerning the doings of a certain rascally male assistant of one of the oldest and most prosperous girl schools in Kánara. We could not believe the story at first, but on inquiry we regret to say that we were compelled to believe in its truth. This story, if published, will make a grave scandal, and will, we fear, go far to check the progress of female education which is still in its infancy in Kánara. We hesitated to give even the slightest publicity to this matter in the fond hope that the authorities of the school in question, and especially the head-mistress under whose maternal care the school is prospering, would take severe steps in the matter. But although the rumour has spread all over the town and can be heard from the mouths of the young and the old alike, we regret that the authorities concerned should have been sleeping over the matter as if nothing serious had happened. If we believe our informant (and we have no reason to disbelieve him after the enquiries which have been made by us), the assistant deserves to be driven out of the school and ignominiously dismissed from the Educational Department. If the authorities of the school still choose to be indifferent to this matter, we are sorry we shall be forced to do the most disgusting duty of publishing the story without any reserve and to call the attention of the higher authorities to it.

Immorality in Kánara and the necessity for appointing respectable men to educational offices in that district.

52. A correspondent of the same newspaper says:—There is a large number of prostitutes in Kánara, and the first enquiry made by Europeans who come to this district as officers or visitors is concerning them. There are very few Europeans who are not in love with them, and people are more afraid of these women than of the officers. The mischief done by these women cannot be described. The natives of Kánara are also very fond of them and they take pride in having one or two mistresses. In this way the people of Kánara are growing immoral. The youths have very bad examples before them, and in order to check this immorality Government should appoint men of strong character to educational offices in this district. The reason why we suggest this is that there are several men of bad character in that department in this district.

Part IV.—Railways.

The Golden Gang on the G. I. P Railway and the employment of Natives as guards on that line.

53. The same newspaper refers to the Golden Gang on the G. I. P. Railway and remarks:—On account of the indiscriminate admission of Europeans into the railway guard service, merely on the ground of their being Europeans, this service has been an asylum to all the dregs of low-class European society. The manager of the G. I. P. Railway, notwithstanding occasional warnings, placed implicit confidence in these gentlemen, and entrusted them with the safety of life and property of thousands of passengers, and we should say that he has been well served after all. We hope that the manager will now see the difference between a costly and faithless European service as illustrated on his own line on the one hand, and the cheap and faithful Native service as illustrated on the B. B. & C. I. Railway on the other. [Several other papers also point out the advisability of employing Natives on the G. I. P. Railway more freely than heretofore, while a few papers take the opportunity to show that Europeans are not so good and Natives not so bad as they are represented to be.]

54. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 21st February, says:—It is very surprising that such mismanagement should prevail on the G. I. P. Railway. If the offenders are not severely punished, the public will lose confidence in the management of the railway company. This case is particularly amusing as the company does not appoint any but Europeans to posts carrying high salaries. It is a nice thing to receive a high salary for being a European and to secretly make money by illegal means. The railway company should properly consider this matter. [The Dnyán Chakshu (9), in its issue of the 20th February, says that it is to be seen how these white thieves are dealt with, that of late many evil deeds of persons belonging to the ruling race are coming to light, and that it is the mild justice and the leniency of Government that have encouraged them to do such things even when they are paid salaries four times as big as those paid to Natives. The Yajdán Parast (143), in its issue of the 17th February, observes that it is the duty of the G. I. P. Railway Company to act firmly in this case and to have an example set thereby to its other European employés. The Káside Mumbai (113), in its issue of the 18th February, says that the proportion of Native guards on the G. I. P. Railway should be double that of Europeans, and that the railway police should be largely improved.]

55. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 17th February, writes:—The first question that occurs to one on reading of the exploits of the Golden Gang is—why employ only European guards all along the G. I. P. line? We have received letters during the last week explaining the cause of this monopoly. But we decline to enter into the question of motives. Mr. Conder is a worthy and conscientious man, and after what has happened, we think that he will see the advantage of a mixed service. It seems to us that Natives ought to make better guards on the whole than Europeans: they are cheap, economical and temperate. We should like to see Mahomedans, and especially Hindus, taking kindly to this branch of the railway service, like Pársis. There are Hindu guards on some of the branch lines in Bengal. Another question that strikes one in glancing at this 'golden' business is—who has suffered most by such a system of extensive robbery? The public or the company? If the public, have no claims been made? If made, have they been heard and satisfied, or dismissed summarily, more so in the case of poor men? We doubt if the company met these claims cheerfully. And we know that the poorer class of passengers and dealers with almost all the railway companies in India, who give them the bulk of their custom, are treated with scant courtesy. Who cares for the poor man's rights? He is too ignorant to enforce them.

Part V.—Municipalities.

A serious complaint against the Bombay fire-brigade.

56. The Rájyabhakt (127), in its issue of the 19th February, refers to the petition made by the inhabitants of Bhuleshvar to the Standing Committee of the Bombay Municipal Corporation complaining of delay in the supply of water and other matters at the recent fire in Bhoiwáda, infers from the petition that the complaint which frequently reaches it about the police and the fire-brigade taking bribe on the occasion of fires to be true, and says that the Standing Committee ought to enquire publicly into the petition made to it, that the Commissioner of Police ought also to move in the matter, and that the Government, the Municipality and the Commissioner of Police ought speedily to take remedial measures.

Local self-government at Surat.

57. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 17th February, writes:—The Surat Municipality has really got out of hand. The electors, as a rule, are ignorant, and the Government have made a mistake, as we pointed out at the time, in appointing Mir Gulám Bába president, a worthy man altogether but totally unfit to manage the turbulent element in the municipality. The result is a dead-lock in business and a serious reflection on self-government. We have heard and read a good deal about the enemies of progress in the country; but with grief and shame we have to confess that none of the outside enemies could possibly be so inimical to the cause as some of its advocates in the ranks of the municipal corporation of Surat. Here is another instance of our 'national unity.' Is not the 'unity' more or less like a holiday attire, to be put on once or twice in the year when holiday-makers are masquerading in "high politics"? As soon as they come to local affairs, that is, to the practical side of politics, they divide themselves into Pársis, Mahomedans and Hindus; and when it comes to that, into Bráhman Hindus, Káyasth Hindus, Marátha Hindus, Gujaráti Hindus, Surat Hindus, Ahmedabad Hindus, and all the rest, according to caste, creed, locality, profession, &c. Happily, this is not the case everywhere, and we still hope that Surat will get rid in time of its schisms and its factions, and try to do public work in a public-spirited manner. It is time also that Government appointed a more intelligent citizen at the head of the civic administration there, one who knows English, has had large experience, and who, while making his presence felt in the Municipal Hall, can also stand the fierce light of an official ukase.

Unsatisfactory condition of the Surat Municipality.

58. The Jáme Jamshed (109), in its issue of the 18th February, says:—The proceedings of the recent municipal meetings at Surat must have led the public to believe that Government will be soon compelled to curtail the rights of the corporation, and the Collector of that district has addressed Government to that effect. It is likely, therefore, that, like Broach, Surat may get the District Collector as the president of the municipal corporation. It is much to be regretted that well-educated persons like the Surat commissioners should fail to conduct their municipal affairs satisfactorily. However the time has not yet arrived for interfering with the rights of the corporation. The day for new elections has approached and the rate-payers of Surat should elect able and useful persons in place of talkative members, who glory more in talk than in doing substantial work. Government ought also to appoint an able and strong-minded person from among the new commissioners as president of the corporation.

Complaint against the Broach Municipality.

59. The Din Mani (74) of Broach, in its issue of the 19th February, refers to the outbreak of cholera in that town, complains of the indifference of the municipality in the matter and of heaps of rubbish being allowed to lie rotting in the streets, as for instance in the quarter known as the Piplichauk, and says that it is foolish on the part of the municipality to have such an inexperienced and untrained man as the present incumbent as its sanitary officer, and that if the municipal president were to move about in the town in person he would see the hardship suffered by the people. [The Broach Samáchár (94), in its issue of the 21st February, also complains of the prevalence of mismanagement in the local municipality and of the present municipal secretary being not quite competent to discharge the duties of his office.]

Suggestions to Mr. Keyser, the Collector, in the matter of the approaching municipal elections at Sátára.

60. The Bodh Sudhákar (6), in its issue of the 20th February, writes :—The approaching municipal elections at Sátára will be hotly contested by rival candidates and there is every probability of undue influence being used for securing the return of certain persons. Every one who still remembers the disgraceful scenes at the last general election will have no difficulty in realizing the truth of our assertion. The honesty of the polling officers was questioned, the voters' returns in certain wards were said to have been tampered with and altered in favour of certain parties, and the friends and supporters of certain candidates were found to have used unfair means in securing a majority of votes in favour of their own men. We all know that, had it not been for the tact, personal influence, suavity of manners and goodness of a sincere friend of the people here, some of the candidates and their supporters would have certainly graced with their presence the prisoners' bar in a magistrate's court. It is in no way desirable to have such disgraceful scenes re-enacted this year. We therefore suggest to our worthy Collector that the greatest precautions should be taken in appointing as polling officers trustworthy persons alone. The appointment of two polling officers for each ward would go a great way in preventing fraudulent practices. The selection of polling officers should not be confined to the municipal employés or to the existing municipal commissioners. On the contrary, we are of opinion that municipal functionaries, either stipendiary or honorary, should have the least hand in the duties of a polling officer. Personal feuds and animosities are reported to be so deep-rooted and rancorous that special precautions will have to be taken to prevent scuffles taking place near the polling stations and the voters being either ill-used or intimidated. Every polling officer should have the assistance of a couple of police constables, and arrangements should be made to keep the polling station free from the myrmidons of the supporters and adherents of candidates. The voters should have full liberty to name such candidates as they like, without the slightest hint, suggestion or threat from the polling officers. No candidate or his friend should be allowed to open an office at the polling station for the purpose of recording votes in his favour, nor should any one be allowed to have a look at the voting papers as they are being dropped in the box. The voting papers should be closed and gummed before being dropped in the box, and the polling officer should have no authority to demand the names of the candidates returned by each voter so that the polling officer himself may have no means of influencing the result of the election by giving sly hints from time to time to the different candidates. Disregard of such precautionary measures at the last general election was the cause of loud complaints and led many persons to question the purity of the results. We hope that Mr. Keyser, with whom the responsibility in connection with the election proceedings primarily lies, will give his earnest attention to this matter before he selects the polling officers. The Revenue, Police, Educational and Judicial Departments afford ample field to make selections from.

Some irregularities about the fixing of the date for municipal elections in Islámpur in the Sátára District.

61. The Pratod (52), in its issue of the 18th February, draws the attention of the Collector of Sátára to certain mistakes of law made by the president of the Islámpur Municipality with regard to the fixing of the date for municipal elections in that town. The 23rd instant, says the paper, has been fixed for the municipal elections. But under Section 4 of the rules on the subject, voters' lists should be published six weeks before the election day, which has not been done, the lists having been published only on the 11th instant, i.e., not even two weeks before the election day. Similarly the notification about the election, which under Rule 10 ought to be published fifteen days before the election, was published only on the 15th instant. In consequence of this the people have not had sufficient previous notice, which they ought to have according to Rule 11. The town has been divided into six wards, but only one polling officer, viz. Mr. Wágle, has been appointed, and he has been directed to finish the whole polling work in three hours. This is not in conformity with the law, which prescribes that every ward should have a distinct polling officer. Thus the voters and the polling officer are likely to be inconvenienced for want of sufficient time, and there is a likelihood of much confusion taking place in consequence.

Transfer of Diwán Navalrái from Hyderabad (Sind) disapproved.

62. A correspondent of the Sind Sudhár (167), in its issue of the 2nd February, writes:—Since the transfer of Diwán Navalrái from Hyderabad, the offices of chairman of the managing committee, chairman of the school board and vice-president of the municipality have remained vacant. Perhaps none of the municipal commissioners is competent to perform these functions. People seem to think that none but Diwán Navalrái can discharge the duties pertaining to these offices and the municipality deeply regrets his transfer.

Part VI.—Native States.

Criticism on the superficial reforms in the Hyderabad (Deccan) State.

63. The Rást Goftár (83), in its issue of the 17th February, writes:—The death of Surgeon-Major Keith of His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught's household brings into prominence the extremely superficial nature of the much-belauded reforms of all sorts which interested people assure us have been introduced into the kingdom of His Highness the Nizám. The State is all fair without and foul within. It is the home of humbug and falsehood, of tinsel and tawdry finery. It is the splendid hospitality of the court to distinguished visitors that serves to hide a multitude of sins. It is the profound civilities and simpering smiles of the great ministers of State, Sir This of the Home Department and His Excellency That of the Foreign Department—self-assumed titles, some of them—that earn for them the reputation of being very nice fellows, if, indeed, not great statesmen. God knows when this huge fabric of sham and hypocricy will be swept away.

His Highness the Mahárája Holkar's offer of a lákh of rupees in aid of the Imperial Institute, London.

64. In noticing a Reuter's telegram that His Highness the Mahárája Holkar has offered to subscribe one lákh of rupees towards the Imperial Institute Fund, the Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 21st February, says:—The offer is, no doubt, made in evidence of the loyalty of the prince to the Queen-Empress, and will silence those English writers who questioned his loyalty and found fault with his administration. The people of India will not, however, be pleased with the liberality of the prince, since it will not benefit them in the least. Had His Highness laid out the amount on some work beneficial to his own subjects the outlay would have been a great blessing, and His Highness could have well named the work after the Queen-Empress. It is to be regretted that Indian princes and millionaires have not yet learnt to do so and are more fond of gaining celebrity in England and among the Indian authorities than of benefiting their own subjects. It seems that the work of filching Indian grandees in the interests of the Imperial Institute has not ceased, though in spite of the protestations made by the Indian public and the press against pressure being brought to bear for subscriptions to the Institute Fund, about fifteen lákhs of rupees having been already collected. It is surprising that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and others interested in the Institute should not yet have ceased from securing more subscriptions from India. It is however to be hoped that no further efforts will be made to raise more money in India. [The Jáme Jamshed (109), in its issue of the same date, expresses similar sentiments.]

His Highness the Mahárája Holkar and contradictory reports about his conduct.

65. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 17th February, writes:—It will be hard to find a Native Prince about whom more contradictory reports of various kinds are spread and believed in than about the present Mahárája Holkar. His Highness is a constant benefactor of those newspapers whose staple food is sensationalism. Whenever any subject sufficiently sensational is lacking, we are sure to hear of His Highness of Indore. Very recently very serious charges have been made against His Highness. We are told that the Mahárája ordered the execution of six Mahomedans accused of being concerned in a riot between Hindus and Mahomedans in which some of the former were killed. The order of execution was so hastily given and carried out that the prisoners were not given an opportunity of appealing against it. It is again complained that His Highness' conduct towards the dowager Mahéránis has been harsh and unnatural. The younger brother of the Mahárája, His Highness Yashvantráo, has been asked to vacate his residence within a week, and old, experienced and confidential advisers of the late Mahárája are also said to be treated with scant courtesy. We mention these charges without any suggestions as to their reliability or otherwise. Our point is to draw attention to them and to suggest to His Highness' advisers the necessity for contradicting them, if they be false, or for justifying the measures, if they be true.

Continuation of the Jághir of the late Anna Sáheb Vinchurkar to his adopted son recommended.

66. The A'ryávart (21), in its issue of the 16th February, says that it is necessary for the British Government to continue the jághir to the adopted son of the late Shrimant Anna Sáheb Vinchurkar with a view to enable him and his whole family to keep up their dignity, and says that if Government deprive Native Princes of their States and annex them for misconduct, Government should also present jághirs for approved good conduct. The paper adds that the descendants and relatives of Vinchurkar should be given the benefit of the Government resolution concerning the appointment of persons belonging to high families to high posts under Government.

Complaints against Mr. Hiráchand Velji, Manager, Gángad.

67. Mr. Nánbha Gagubha, tálukdár, Gángad, writes to the Hitechchhu (80) of Ahmedabad of the 21st February to complain of Mr. Hiráchand Velji, the Manager, and his two agents, Messrs. Kálábhái and Kanthadji, plundering, as if, the táluka, of Mr. Hiráchand having misappropriated several thousands of rupees, mentions some cases in support of his complaint, and remarks that Mr. Hiráchand told him personally that so long as Mr. Pestonji was Tálukdári Settlement Officer no one could remove him from his present post, that his (the tálukdár's) petitions to the Collector and the Commissioner, N. D., would be of no avail and he would have to suffer a good deal, and desires that Mr. Hiráchand should be removed from his present office.

The Vaidarbh (2), in its issue of the 16th February, writes :—The rules for the sale of the occupancy right in building sites in Berár are good, and they are a decided improvement upon the present very confused and ill-regulated state of things. For the first time an attempt is made to introduce uniformity in the procedure relative to the granting of sites. This itself means less jobbery, capriciousness and favouritism. In the rules the final granting of an application for site is made to rest with a higher Government officer. This is so far good. But the rules are badly drafted and introduce a very dilatory procedure, almost every step of which is concealed from the party concerned. The Civil Procedure Code is elaborate, but the proceedings in conformity with it are open to the parties and even to the public. Under the present rules it may take months before an application for a site is granted. In the meantime the applicant may not know what is going on or where the hitch lies.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Sir John Gorst's explanation about no mention of India being made in the speech from the Throne pronounced unsatisfactory.

1. In noticing the remark of the Under Secretary of State for India that no reference was made to India in the speech from the Throne because prosperity prevailed there, the Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 26th February, says:—The reason given by Sir John Gorst is strange. The condition of India is not only not prosperous, but is actually distressful, as has been already proved by well-known English and Indian writers by statistical and other evidence. Certain parts of the country are suffering from distress verging on famine, while several other portions have miraculously escaped from a similar misfortune. The monetary condition has been so bad that the Supreme Government has been compelled to resort to the unusual course of indenting upon the resources of the subordinate administrations. Leaving these things aside, the Indian National Congress is such an important movement that its existence ought not to have been ignored in the Royal speech, and the very fact of its exclusion proves the dislike entertained by the ministry towards India. Sir John Gorst observed that Government was not unfriendly to Native aspirations, but the fact is that the ministry has done acts that have been discouraging the political progress of the Natives. A recent instance of the kind is Lord Salisbury's styling Mr. Dádábhái Navroji a "black man," and thereby giving offence to the Natives and throwing hindrances in the way of his getting into Parliament. It is, however, gratifying that the ministry had not the courage to declare the policy followed by it and had to admit indirectly the impropriety of the course hitherto adopted by it. And for this the people of India are indebted to the Liberal party, which has forced the ministry to make the admission. [The Jáme Jamshed (109), in its issue of the same date, and the Akhbáre Sodágar (88), in that of the 27th February, express similar sentiments.]

Report of the Public Service Commission and the India Council.

2. With reference to the reply given by the Secretary of State for India in the House of Lords that a special Committee of the India Council was considering the report of the Public Service Commission, the Jáme Jamshed (109), in its issue of the 26th February, says:—It is also reported that the Committee is prepared to discard a few of the recommendations made by the Government of India at the suggestion of the Public Service Commission for giving the natives of India a larger share than they enjoy at present in the public service of the country. The India Council is mainly composed of such members as can give little hope of their putting before the Secretary of State the needs and wishes of the people of India, and the greater portion of the Council, entertaining sympathy as it does for the covenanted and uncovenanted European civil servants, is not likely to weigh impartially the question of the needs and desires of the natives of India. The indispensable want of a few of the members of the India Council being natives of India is glaringly shown in the present instance. A very large number of Natives have already come to the conclusion that little good can be expected from the labours of the Public Service Commission, and ardently desire the appointment of a Royal Commission of Inquiry into the administration of India.

Rumoured retirement of His Excellency Lord Reay from office before the expiry of his full term of five years regretted.

3. The Gujarát Mitră (79), in its issue of the 24th February, refers to the news received by the last English mail of the intended retirement of His Excellency Lord Reay from office before the expiry of his term of five years, remarks that the causes thereof are rumoured to be the reversal of His Excellency's decision by the Secretary of State for India in the Cambay case and the attack made upon him in several Home papers in the matter of the Crawford case, and observes:—The people of this presidency will certainly be sorry at his early retirement from office. It is the good fortune of the people of the Bombay Presidency to have such a noble, kind, straightforward and just Governor as His Excellency Lord Reay. Bombay has had very few Governors like His Lordship. The public, therefore, feels extremely sorry to lose such an excellent ruler, and that too before the expiry of his full term of office. [A few other papers also regret that His Excellency Lord Reay should think of retiring early from the Governorship of Bombay, as rumoured, and say that he has proved another Ripon.]

Illegality of taking into consideration circumstances not brought in evidence before the Commission in deciding the Crawford case.

4. The Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 28th February, disapproves of the suggestion made by some newspapers that while giving their decision on the Crawford case the Bombay Government should consider the evidence which is in their possession but which was not brought before the Commission, and says that it will be illegal to do so and that if this course was to be adopted there was no necessity for spending rupees three lákhs and a half on the enquiry.

Mr. Arthur Crawford and the sympathy felt for him by some Government officers here and in England.

5. The Satyă Mitră (130), in its issue of the 24th February, refers to the rumoured acquittal of Mr. Crawford by the Crawford Commission of the charges of bribery and corruption brought against him, and says:—A trustworthy friend of ours informs us that not only will Mr. Crawford get his pension, but will also be able to get his costs of the case and damages to some extent, which together will come up to about three lákhs of rupees. It is said that several officers here and in England strongly sympathize with Mr. Crawford, and hence the attack made in the London Times and several other influential newspapers on the so-called hasty and thoughtless conduct of the officers of the Bombay Government. His Excellency Lord Reay undertook the work through the instigation of some of his subordinate officers, and is consequently not to blame for it. He has not acted thus without the opinion or sanction of the ex-Viceroy, the Earl of Dufferin. Mr. Crawford has now been indirectly given another consolation by the appointment of his son, who assisted him during his trial before the Commission, as Political Agent, Beluchistan, on a salary of Rs. 2,500 per mensem, exclusive of other allowances that he will get. It is said that this indirect help has been given to Mr. Crawford by the Earl of Dufferin, and that he alluded to the appointment in question during his stay in Bombay while on his way home.

The views expressed in connection with the Crawford case by the "Indian Telegraph Union" disapproved.

6. The Jáme Jamshed (109), in its issue of the 1st March, says:—The "Indian Telegraph Union" has despatched a telegram for publication in the Home newspapers warning the English public that evil consequences would follow from the untimely formation of an opinion on the Crawford case and expressing certain views in the matter. The Union had no right to send such a message, since the Indian public does not at all agree in the views expressed therein. The desire of the Bombay Government in instituting an enquiry into the case is praiseworthy, but the public can never express approval of certain mistakes committed by it. The Government service ought to be cleared of the self-incriminating Mámlatdárs without further delay.

Disapproval of the mode of British justice in cases in which the accused are Europeans, and remarks regarding the Crawford case and the action Government authorities ought to take in regard to it.

7. The Gujaráti (78), in its issue of the 24th February, writes:—During the last two or three years every province in this country has brought to light disgraceful scandals which ought to make our rulers think seriously of the system which makes them possible. If our rulers are wise and candid, they will admit that many of these were due to the systematic attempts made by interested parties, and even sometimes by the Government itself, to shield the guilty officers from the punishment they richly deserved. Though Englishmen are superior to the natives of India in certain respects, they are after all men with all the human weaknesses and foibles to be found in other nations. It is no use concealing and suppressing things, because moral laws are inexorable in their operation and will assert their authority despite the exertions of short-sighted people to impede the inevitable consequences of their infraction. There is a general impression in the Native community throughout India that an European offender is sure to escape scot-free in a majority of cases, and those who have eyes to see and ears to hear will find almost every month some case in some part of the country in which justice has more or less miscarried, while Natives placed under exactly similar conditions are very severely dealt with. It was only the other day that the unfortunate Kungen Menon, who, we think, was too heavily sentenced, died in his prison-cell at Madras of a malady brought on by a diet which did not agree with his constitution. In awarding punishment to a European it is generally thought that conviction itself is tantamount to punishment, and the ridiculous sentence recently passed on a European at Karáchi who was convicted of serious defalcations is a striking illustration in point. Kungen Menon, the late Judge of Tellichery, however, could not claim the benefit of that indulgence and sympathy which almost always relieve the lot of European offenders. Quite recently two officers in Bengal, one of whom was accused of corruption and commercial speculation in money collected twice over from poor people, have been treated with unjustifiable leniency. The Native community is entitled to ask whether it is desirable in the interests of British justice and reputation that they should have been let off so lightly and whether a native of India would have been so treated. In Madras certain scandals were quietly hushed up two or three years ago. Was this procedure calculated to raise the tone of the administration in that presidency and to impress the people with a sense of British justice and impartiality? Would British soldiers go out shooting and make themselves merry at the expense of the lives of the poor Kunbis, if they knew that the goddess of justice was always impartial? The non-publication of the Commissioners' report in the celebrated Cambay scandal case and of the reasons which induced the Secretary of State for India to reverse the judgment of the Commissioners was also impolitic and naturally gave rise to all sorts of speculation calculated to shake the confidence of the people in the justice of our rulers. Would a Crawford Commission have been necessary if Sir Philip Wodehouse, Sir Richard Temple and Sir James Fergusson had discharged their duties with that strict regard to the interests of administration which no ruler worthy of the name can help paying to higher considerations than those of friendship or nationality? The expression "the prestige of the service and of the ruling nation ought to be maintained" is ill understood by people who shirk their obvious responsibilities and are themselves instrumental in lowering the reputation of the governing classes by the adoption of shortsighted and suicidal methods. The feeling we have referred to is so generally prevalent that when Mr. Crawford was arrested it was predicted by more than ninety-five per cent. of the Native community that he would come out a blameless man from any proceedings that might be instituted against him. There were also many, and there are still some, who believe that his arrest is simply a preliminary step to his becoming the Governor of some province in India. The former prophecy has been fulfilled by accident or otherwise, so far at least as the judgment of the Commission is concerned. The latter is so foolish that we would not have noticed it here but for the deep-rooted conviction it indicates of a large portion of the Native population. We put it plainly to our English friends whether such a state of public opinion is at all creditable to the administration which gives rise to it. It is of course possible to say that this is all exaggeration, but we earnestly ask them, as Mr. Hume asked Sir A. Colvin, to come down from their Olympian heights and move in Native society and try to ascertain its actual feeling on the subject. The fact is that those who are misrepresenting His Excellency Lord Reay's actions and vilifying him are the worst foes of British justice and reputation, and those who rendered the Crawford incident possible are perhaps greater offenders in a certain sense than Mr. Crawford himself. He was the overpetted and overfondled officer of the Bombay Government, but when the spoilt child became unruly and uncontrollable, the unfortunate head of the province who tries to restore discipline and order is misrepresented, abused and reviled. In the words of the Hermit in the Mofussil who wrote the other day to the Pioneer, His Excellency Lord Reay's predecessors in office sowed the wind and he is reaping the whirlwind. The Bombay Government is now confronted with questions of tremendous difficulty which had as yet never arisen in the administration of this country, or perhaps of any other country, and people who ought to help His Lordship and keep England's reputation unsullied are busily engaged in diligently concocting sensational telegrams and manufacturing thundering leading articles for the purpose of harassing the distinguished ruler who has 'faced the tempest like a brave and honest man.' The Augean impurities to be cleansed are of such long standing and so sickening a character that even if the Commission that investigated the thirty-two charges had arrived at a conclusion different from that which, it is believed, it has recorded, the work of purification would have been but imperfect. The fiasco in which the enquiry seems to have ended will only deepen the feeling prevalent in the Native community, and if this result is to be avoided we think that the Commissioners' report should be published so as to enable the public to judge of the manner in which they have done their laborious work. Whether the final verdict goes against Mr. Crawford or not, it is universally believed that the Secretary of State for India will sanction his pension for his splendid and honest services to Government, and that the publication of the report would in no way improve his position for any practical purpose; but in justice to the Commissioners and to Mr. Crawford the report ought not, we think, to be suppressed, but exposed in due time to the full light of public criticism. The practice of withholding reports from the public at large when the whole enquiry is conducted in broad day-light would remove the judgment of Commissioners in all cases from the only effectual check that can be exercised over judicial tribunals like that appointed in the Crawford case and give room for all sorts of speculation damaging to the reputation of all the parties concerned. This result would be simply deplorable and should be avoided by every possible means. India has for some time past entered upon a new phase of life and reached a political and administrative crisis. The latter has already reached the acutest stage in the Bombay Presidency, and if those at the head of the local and Indian administration will not wisely steer the ship of State, the day of judgment must come in some form or other, as it has already done in this province and placed His Excellency Lord Reay's Government in unprecedented difficulties.

Attack made by some Anglo-Indian journals on the Bombay Government for their action against Mr. Crawford disapproved and His Excellency Lord Reay vindicated and encouraged to pursue his righteous course.

8. In an article headed "A gang of Anglo-Indian conspirators," the Sudhárak (17), in its issue of the 25th February, writes:—We are sorry that we cannot give them a milder name—those who have been amazingly persistent in their unblushing efforts to draw the Bombay Government away from the path of rectitude which it is courageously treading. Their latest feat has been to get the great Tory paper of England to play into their hands. The London correspondent of the Bombay Gazette telegraphs the contents of the latest thunderbolt hurled by the Thunderer at His Excellency Lord Reay's Government. We do not know whether to be indignant at the dishonourable tricks of the person who supplies information to the Times or to smile at the simplicity—to say nothing worse—of that paper in swallowing that information as it comes. Anyhow, we see that an audacious effort is being made to mislead public opinion in England in regard to this sickening affair, and we think that unless counteracted fully and in time it will end in mischief. We suggest that the agency some time back established in Bombay to keep the English public correctly informed of the real state of Native public opinion should, if it has not already done so, wire to the leading papers in England the views of the Native press in this matter. Everyone sees that the Native press is unanimous in its approval of the policy which Lord Reay's Government is pursuing, and thoughtful people in England, when the other side is before them, will at any rate think twice before they subscribe to the sweeping condemnation which the London Times, acting on interested and therefore untrustworthy reports, is at present pronouncing on Lord Reay's action. The London Times is informed that the Anglo-Indian community is outraged by the high-handed manner in which the Bombay Government are proceeding in this matter, that they are wantonly delaying the communication of the conclusions of the Commissioners to the accused, and that Englishmen in India are impatient at this monstrously barbarous and palpably unjust delay. We cannot obviously presume to say what Englishmen in India are thinking of the action of Government, but if they have not lost the love of fair-play and justice natural to an Englishman, we believe very few Anglo-Indians will be found to hold the alleged views beyond a small knot of the friends of Mr. Crawford—men under personal obligations to him like, for example, some disappointed officers in the Educational Department, who, by the way, are a burden to the department as nothing can be made of them, in whatever chair they are put. But whatever Englishmen may think, one fact is clear that the Native public feels that the investigation has not been thorough, and that if the reports that are in the air be true, the Commissioners have astonishingly failed in arriving at the truth. The Native public, for instance, does not understand how the Commissioners could be so simple as to accept the theory of a Bráhman conspiracy put forward by the defence—a theory the absurdity of which can be seen on the very face of it. The Honourable Mr. Latham in his concluding speech said that the theory of a Native conspiracy to ruin Mr. Crawford could be sustained only on the assumption that every civilian in the Government service was a fool and every Native officer was a rogue. But even this is not sufficient. No rogue ever entered into a conspiracy incriminating himself, and the only conclusion, therefore, to which the supporters of the ludicrous conspiracy theory are driven is that the Natives in the service of the Bombay Presidency are mad persons who endeavour to ruin "honourable innocents" and highly-placed officials out of pure love for the work, regardless of consequences to themselves. At this rate, we should not be surprised if we were told one day that the White Chapel murderer was a Native Magistrate from the Bombay Presidency, gone on special leave to England for the accomplishment of his Satanic purpose. If the Commissioners have tried to explain away all the unsavoury facts recently disclosed on the assumption of the existence of a conspiracy—a conspiracy, be it noted, for which no shadow of aim has been proved or even alleged,—we have no hesitation in saying that they have attempted a gross outrage on common sense. We know that this is strong language, but this is indeed one of those occasions when the use of strong language is not only excusable but necessary. In the interests of an individual, efforts are being made to take away the character of a whole nation, and it is the duty of every honest man to denounce these efforts in the most unequivocal terms. The path of the Government was already rugged; it was further strewn with thorns by officious judges and "honest" and "disinterested" newspapers and lovers of truth and even-handed justice. But His Excellency Lord Reay has till now bravely toiled on. An obstacle, however, more formidable than any which he had hitherto to surmount is now lying in his path. The most influential journal in England has now declared itself against him. Lord Cross, for party reasons, may choose to stand well with the journal, whose support is invaluable to the ministry to which he belongs. What will His Excellency Lord Reay do? Will he stop? Will he turn back? We devoutly hope, not. It is true that he has powerful forces arrayed against him. But he has in his own heart the lofty consciousness of a sacred discharge of duty; the best part of his countrymen in India are applauding him, and a grateful, though powerless nation, is behind him. If he, the standard-bearer of justice and purity of administration, now flag in his course, the natives of this country will lose all confidence in the righteousness of the British Government. Much as he has done, what he has to do is much more. First of all there is Mr. Crawford. After dealing with him as he deserves, His Excellency Lord Reay must turn to those who have confessed to the payment of bribes, and while he sees that those who have sought illegal gains and have wantonly strayed from the path of rectitude are promptly punished, he must also see that those who succumbed to a system of terrorism as the last resort have no reason to rue the honest confession that they have made of their crimes. In this connection we are glad to observe that an excellent letter, signed by "A Hermit in the Mofussil," has appeared in the Pioneer, which takes a correct view of the whole case. The Native public fully shares the views of the "hermit." Justice is necessary, but wherever reasonably possible, it ought to be tempered with mercy. In conclusion, we respectfully say to Lord Reay that the eyes of the whole Native public are now turned towards him; that it has its own convictions in the matter, and will continue to have those convictions in spite of what a thousand Commissions may say; that if he yields to the howl that is now unscrupulously raised against him, the interests of the British Empire in India will receive a rude shock; and that on the other hand if he manfully perseveres in the course he has been nobly pursuing, he will be doing a lasting service to this country and to his own, and will earn a permanent place in the hearts of the Indian people.

9. The Subodh Patrika (16), in its issue of the 24th February, says that all the attacks made upon His Excellency Lord Reay by various English and Anglo-Indian papers in connection with the Crawford case are not prompted by a virtuous indignation, but merely by resentment at a European being subjected to an enquiry amid Native witnesses, and that it is the action of two Judges of the Bombay High Court which furnished these gentlemen with a ready handle to work with. The Government of Lord Reay, continues the paper, deserves credit and not reproach for its conduct. For had Government consulted their own ease they might have made a perfunctory secret enquiry, nominally stayed the evil for a while, though only to let it grow after them more freely to the great injury of the public interests. But they chose like men and statesmen with courage and a sense of duty, and though they may like others following that rugged path be for a time denounced and bespattered with dirt by enraged or blinded partizans, there can be little doubt that their conduct will be vindicated in the end. Indeed, unless the heavens are to fall and British rule with British sense of justice and moral prestige is numbering its days in India, the scandals which have for so many years served to bring that rule into disrepute, and which Lord Reay and his Councillors have courageously probed to the bottom, will no longer continue to poison the moral atmosphere of this presidency and the Augean stable of corruption, if any, will be effectually cleansed. The Commission has sent in its report, but the matter is still to be decided by a higher authority, and we should therefore have abstained from noticing the question. The audacious and repeated attempts made by certain writers to pervert and confuse truth and right and mystify public opinion, and to divert against the educated Natives and the righteous Government of Lord Reay the virtuous indignation so richly merited by Mr. Crawford's conduct, which has been improper on his own showing to go no further than that, would however turn silence into a fault, a crime against public interests of a most abiding character. To begin with, then, we are told that the Commission has not only acquitted Mr. Crawford of corruption, but held the evidence to be the result of a conspiracy against him. We do not believe in the latter; at least we cannot do so without being forced to a number of wild alternatives, viz., that either the Commissioners were selected for their incompetency, that the Bengal administration is conducted on strange principles, or that Bengal officials have a contempt for the intellect and morale of the whole administrative machinery in Western India from the Governor in Council down to the lowest Mámlatdár. For to think that Native Princes and peasants, Hindus and Musalmans, Kánarese, Maráthás and Gujarátis, educated and uneducated, all castes, creeds and grades, Bráhmans, Parbhus, and Lingáyats, who are daily declared (and not without some reason) to be incapable of co-operating with the National Congress party—to say that all these diverse elements should have heartily joined to conspire against a high and powerful English officer is to take leave of one's sense and reason. We have therefore no word by which to characterize the logic which joins to the conspiracy the ablest members of the European covenanted Civil Service with English solicitors and barristers to effect the same sinister end, viz., the ruin of one of the latter's own caste, and we use this term deliberately to mark our view of the enormity of the offence which certain English writers are just now committing simply because Mr. Crawford belongs to their race, for the highest Native in his place would by them have been made short shrift of long ago for the improper conduct of which he has been guilty, apart from his alleged corruption. Mr. Crawford admits his notorious indebtedness which has lasted since 1872. He admittedly lived splendidly on a fraction of his pay and even made remittances to his bankers. He also admits that the witnesses bore him no ill-will. Hanmantráo goes about stalking among the people as his confidant, hangs on him constantly as a domestic, collects bribes for him and stipulates for official favours of one kind or another in return, not once or in one place and to one man, but for a long period, in many districts and to successive men; the money is judicially traced to Hanmantráo but not to Mr. Crawford, and yet his agent remains poor! What a story to believe! Were the Mámlatdárs such fools as to give away their ill-to-be-spared money one after another without seeing proof of the promised return in any previous case? These are points which it seems to us must be answered satisfactorily before we can as reasonable men put any faith in the conspiracy theory. The entire story of a widespread conspiracy against Mr. Crawford may do in willing Anglo-India or London, but here with the Native population it can only produce a feeling of loathing and wonder.

10. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 24th February, says:—Seldom has it been our lot to witness such a spectacle of public morality as that presented by some of Mr. Crawford's friends in connection with an administrative inquiry. Overzeal to shield a friend may be excused, but it must not blind the most interested to the claims of truth and justice. What do we see in this case? We see a systematic attempt made, not only to befriend the accused, but also, as it were, to go behind the Commission, to incriminate all and sundry concerned in preparing the case, to mislead public opinion, and finally to force the hands of Government by making out the accused to be the victim of a widespread conspiracy. Why this policy of shift and subterfuge in the defence of an honest officer? We leave it to these gentlemen to justify to themselves the methods they have adopted or the motives that have actuated them. The charge of conspiracy has been very ably met by the Indu Prakásh, who by the publication of an old letter and otherwise shows how unnecessary a conspiracy was, even if it could be possible, to bring matters to the present pass. Were Mr. Crawford's previous troubles also the result of a conspiracy? Has he not been 'notoriously' in debt, as he himself admits? And has he not had to compound his debts more than once? Has he not in spite of this been kept on, as if nothing had happened? More than honest Sir P. Wodehouse are his two successors to blame for the present scandal. Knowing his antecedents they still kept him in Bombay, invested at times with powers such as are seldom exercised even by the Governor of the presidency. What guarantee was there that in his circumstances he might not be exposed again and again to temptations? What was there to prevent the ill-informed Native dignitary and the needy seeker of employment from fancying that there was no chance for them except by propitiating the all-powerful dispenser of patronage? Here we refer only to indebtedness. If there has been a conspiracy, to borrow the word, it has apparently existed in high places and not amongst petitioners and place-seekers. Away from Bombay Mr. Crawford might have retrieved the past, and his brilliant talents and rare energy might have benefited the world. As it is, we find him nearly killed with kindness, the service becoming discredited and the public scandalized. These are the after-effects of the personal rule of Sir Richard Temple, and more especially of Sir James Fergusson. The present administration has received its bitter legacy, and in trying to save its successors from a similar experience the Government of His Excellency Lord Reay has incurred the displeasure of some of the dominant party in India and in England. In resorting to their present tactics these misguided journalists fail to see how they are lowering British prestige in India and what an evil example they are setting to the Natives. The Indians are apt pupils; and this is not the first time that they have witnessed the temporary success of such agitation. Success, however, where the cause is not good, is but short-lived. We doubt very much whether English opinion will be guided entirely by one-sided representations or by representations that are at variance with the facts and circumstances of the case. Still it is better, we think, to publish in England the true version of the matter, and we are glad that this work has been already undertaken. Nothing could be more convincing than a telegram based on the thoughtful and impartial criticism that has appeared in the columns of the Bombay Gazette on the whole question, beginning with Mr. Crawford's suspension and ending with an explanation as to how Government cannot be coerced into making premature announcements. Ignorant or selfish as English opinion may be with regard to India, we do not think it will suffer the administration of this country to be abandoned to the guidance of half a dozen irresponsible newspapers.

11. The Rást Goftár (83), in its issue of the 24th February, writes:—"Oh! it is all a conspiracy, a wide-spread, far-reaching, diabolical conspiracy. It is all those wily Bráhmans' doings." Those who talk in this fashion do not know, perhaps, that they are talking utter nonsense. Granting for a moment that the Bráhman is by nature a wily being, it is impossible to conceive that some scores of men have banded together to ruin a man, and at the same time to incriminate themselves, without any adequate motive for so doing. If it is at all a conspiracy, the Government officials are woefully duped by the intriguers.

It would indeed be of a piece with this utterly wild theory to assert that the English civilians, who were charged with the preliminary inquiries, were participators in the plan to ruin Mr. Crawford. We have said more than once that we should be glad to see Mr. Crawford fairly acquitted of the charges brought against him. But even if he were acquitted, the evidence before the Commission has shown that the Government were perfectly justified in acting on the supposition that there was a very strong primâ facie case against Mr. Crawford. Government has been in this matter no respecter of persons, as the newspaper scribes evidently are, and His Excellency Lord Reay deserves the support of all true men for the courage and honesty he has displayed in facing the tumult that has been raised around him.

12. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 20th February, writes:—It is officially declared that the cost of the Crawford Commission has been rupees three lákhs and a half. The Pioneer says: "As human governments go, a good deal of money is squandered in sowing the wind, but the Bombay Government may claim to have beaten the record in sowing something worse." Why sowing the wind and something worse? To place a covenanted servant of the Crown under enquiry on the suspicion of horrible corruption—is this worse than sowing the wind? The position of some of our Anglo-Indian contemporaries is very inconsistent. They have raised a hue and cry about corruption of justice in Bombay and in the same breath they denounce the local Government for its disinterested attempt to mete out justice. Has not the Commission brought to light the miserable indebtedness of a high civilian? Has it not thrown open the deadly putridness that was slowly and silently spreading over the judicial system of the presidency proper? The Commission has done an immense good. Of course there is no doubt that His Excellency Lord Reay and his advisers have made a mess of things. He was ill-advised enough to offer absolute pardon to corrupt judicial officers. He was made to believe that the Government had power to withhold sanction for the prosecution of Government servants in case of any offence. Some urge that there was no other way of getting evidence against Mr. Crawford. What then? Can the Government be in any way justified in having recourse to an illegal and immoral act even in the cause of justice? Lord Reay has acted unknowingly on the dangerous and mischievous principle, "the end justifieth the means." However, the legal experts believe that there was a way by which the end could have been obtained without the Government being committed to the awkward position of countenancing corruption.

13. The Dnyánodayă (10), in its issue of the 28th February, writes:—We cannot understand the desire of the English papers to see Mr. Crawford acquitted. That one in the Civil Service should be guilty of bribery is of course a most unpleasant scandal, but it will be a greater scandal and a darker blot on the Civil Service if he escaped just punishment. The corruption amongst the Mámlatdárs, while inexcusable, was no doubt encouraged and made possible by the corruption at the head office, and while we hope in the cause of good government that their case may some time be firmly dealt with, because proved to be unfit for their office, we prefer first to see the fountain-head cleansed, and then we can hope for the cleansing of the whole.

Disapproval of the attack made by some Anglo-Indian and English newspapers on the Bombay Government for the latter's action in the Crawford case.

14. The Sudhárak (17), in its issue of the 25th February, in its Maráthi columns, says:—There is no doubt that the Crawford case has maddened some English newspapers. They think that the Bombay Government will be frightened by their howl against them and the Mámlatdárs and will acquit Mr. Crawford. If those determined to prosecute Mr. Crawford had been ignorant of the futility of their empty threats, they would have been frightened by the hue and cry raised by the London Times. It would be wise for the friends of Mr. Crawford not to irritate His Excellency Lord Reay, who, although on account of his present position cannot now openly give out the information which he possesses about all the dark deeds of Mr. Crawford, can place it before Parliament when he goes home and inform the outside public of it. It is to be regretted that one of the parties in this case being Government and the other a private individual the Government are placed at a disadvantage inasmuch as they cannot make use of the weapons which are freely used by the other party. If there had been a private individual in place of Government, the newspapers taking the cudgels on his behalf could have easily spread many false rumours and could have made such an agitation in India and in England as would have effectively neutralised the effect of the several false rumours spread by the supporters of Mr. Crawford. We are very sorry that those who are fond of reading amusing literature have been deprived of the amusement which they would have derived from reading all sorts of false rumours spread by both the parties, if Government had not been on one side. Although the partisans of Mr. Crawford have been deceiving the common people, yet they should not suppose that they have won the battle, that their opponents' provision and ammunition have been exhausted, and that they have been totally defeated. They are sure to repent afterwards of such a delusion. [Several other papers disapprove of the attack made by Anglo-Indian and English newspapers, and particularly by the London Times, upon the Bombay Government for the latter's action in the Crawford case.]

15. The Satyă Shodhak (58), in its issue of the 24th February, says that His Excellency Lord Reay was quite right in not publishing the report of the Crawford Commission, that His Excellency has acted strictly in accordance with Act XXXVII of 1850 and with the order of the Secretary of State for India in the matter, that the work of disposing of the Crawford case is not so easy as the London Times fancies, that the work in which British justice and impartiality are on their trial cannot be done in a moment, and that the attack of the London Times upon Lord Reay is malicious, and remarks:—The matter which has engaged the attention of His Excellency Lord Reay is not of recent origin and of His Excellency's creation. Is it not sinful to say that it is the outcome of a Bráhman conspiracy and to blame Lord Reay in the matter? We are even more anxious than the London Times or the friends of Mr. Crawford to see him acquitted, but not injudiciously. We want the case to be decided by the Supreme Government after hearing both the sides. It is of no use deciding the case on the supposition that it is the outcome of a Bráhman conspiracy and that Europeans will never do the things alleged against Mr. Crawford. His Excellency Lord Reay cannot therefore be blamed for the delay that has occurred in disposing of the case. The high-handed actions of Government officers have been so far exposed, simply because His Excellency Lord Reay, who is a lover of truth, strong-minded and straightforward, is at the head of the local administration.

The fate of the Mámlatdárs concerned in the Crawford case and a suggestion to Government to seize this opportunity for separating executive from judicial functions.

16. The Gujaráti (78), in its issue of the 24th February, writes:—Those Mámlatdárs who have purchased their mámlats by voluntary bribes cannot of course be retained in their offices. The number of such men is comparatively very small, but in dealing with them the Bombay Government are of course impaled on the horns of a dilemma. Government must either break their promise or retain these self-convicted Mámlatdárs in their magisterial offices. None of the branches of the dilemma is possible. The only way out of the difficulty lies, in our judgment, in seizing this opportunity for the separation of the executive and judicial functions for which the Indian National Congress has asked. The step would be highly beneficial to the people and the benefit would be a tangible return for the three lákhs of rupees that have been spent on the Crawford inquiry which has brought forth only a ridiculous mouse after two months' painful labour. Mr. Crawford has done something for the people, and in some places his services will be lovingly remembered; but if his sudden and distressing fall becomes instrumental in inaugurating a reform in the direction we have indicated, the people of this presidency will be much indebted to the fallen civilian, whose career will be a beautiful illustration of how heavy misfortunes sometimes bring great blessings in their train.

The Crawford case and the fate of the Mámlatdárs concerned in it.

17. The Satyă Shodhak (58), in its issue of the 24th February, asks why only eight of the Mámlatdárs concerned in the Crawford case have been deprived, if the rumour be true, of their judicial powers, and says that it does not understand what work the Mámlatdárs are to do when they are deprived of their judicial powers. [The Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 28th February, says that the people are anxious to know what principle has been followed by Government in depriving only five Mámlatdárs of their magisterial powers, and whether that principle does or does not interfere with the assurances given to them by Government.]

The effects of the Crawford case upon Native society and the praise the denounced Mámlatdárs really deserve.

18. The Poona Vaibhav (49), in its issue of the 24th February, says:—If Mr. Crawford has been found not guilty, it follows that the witnesses for the prosecution were all liars and their evidence fabricated, and that they should be punished. These two are the immediate results of the enquiry. But the future consequences will be more dreadful. This case will supply ground for the anti-Natives to say that Natives, whatever their position, are unworthy of confidence, and no notice will hereafter be taken of even the meanest actions of Europeans and no heed will be paid to the grievances of Natives, however loudly they may complain of them. The Crawford case is not the outcome of a Native conspiracy, as it is supposed to be by the Commissioners. How do they account for the connection of many Europeans with this case? About two years ago we wrote against Mr. Crawford, at the same time recommending Government to change the law regarding bribery. We then anticipated the present difficulties and cited some instances in point. It was found very difficult to procure evidence in the present case and some persons did actually deny everything at the eleventh hour. Particularly the Mámlatdárs were much afraid to give evidence. If they confessed there was the Honourable Mr. Justice Jardine to say that they should be deprived of their magisterial powers, and if they did not, they would incur the displeasure of Government. We are of opinion that those who told the truth are alone worthy of being believed in this case. Not only this, but we recommend Government to have full confidence in them hereafter. We consider those persons to be of a high moral character who atone for their immoral actions and confess them even at the risk of being publicly ridiculed and punished. Ráo Sáhebs Sindekar, Dabir and others who are severely attacked by the London Times and the aged Dnyánoba (Dnyán Prakásh) which echoes its sentiments, deserve, in our opinion, to be given a grand pán supári entertainment and to be presented with congratulatory addresses; for, it was they who exposed and made known to the world things which had become a subject of household talk for many years past. The Commissioners say that this is a conspiracy, but if our people had been able enough to form such a big conspiracy there would have been no necessity for a Commission to enquire into the Crawford case. Now that civilization has made so much progress and there is so much intercourse between Her Majesty the Queen and her foreign subjects, and that public opinion has attained much importance, one will be at a loss to see Mr. Crawford acquitted when the evidence against him is ten times stronger than that which was found sufficient to send Hanmantráo to the Yerowda jail for two years.

Re-appointment of the Honourable Mr. Latham to the Bombay Legislative Council approved.

19. The Rást Goftár (83), in its issue of the 24th February, says that the re-appointment of the Honourable Mr. Latham to the Bombay Legislative Council will be unanimously approved of by the public, that though he is an official member of the Council his independence in it has well been shown at the time of the recent discussion on the Bombay Municipal Bill, and that the people have come to the conclusion that it is more advantageous to them to have such independent, though official members, on the Council.

Praise of Mr. Lee-Warner, Secretary to the Bombay Government, and of Mr. Monteath, his locum tenens.

20. The same newspaper writes:—We are sorry that Mr. W. Lee-Warner, Secretary to the Bombay Government, is compelled by ill-health to take furlough for a year. By his ability and energy, as well as by the varied experience he has gained in the districts and in Native States, he is well qualified to discharge the duties of Secretary in the Political, Judicial and Educational Departments. His capacity has gained for him a position over the heads of not a few of his seniors in the Civil Service, and he has maintained that position with credit to himself and advantage to the State. We are glad that Mr. Lee-Warner is succeeded in his post by Mr. Monteath, His Excellency the Governor's Private Secretary. He too is a very able man, and his very appointment to the post by a Governor like His Excellency Lord Reay marks his fitness for it.

A recommendation for filling up a vacancy which will shortly occur among the Judges of the Bombay Small Causes Court.

21. The Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 1st March, says:—The Second Judgeship in the Bombay Small Causes Court will shortly fall vacant by the retirement of Mr. Warden, and it will be nothing more than simple justice to Mr. Hormasji Dádábhái, pleader, to bestow a permanent place on him in the arrangement that will be made. Mr. Hormasji is a successful pleader and has filled between the years 1874 and 1884 the post of an acting Judge of the Court no less than seven times. Notwithstanding this his claims have been passed over when making arrangements for filling up permanent appointments.

Batta to military sepoys located at Quetta recommended.

22. The Pandit (162), in its issue of the 1st March, says:—The camp at Quetta is like Bushire, Aden and some other camps out of British India. Quetta is a very unhealthy place, where the extremes of heat and cold are to be found, and a greater number of sepoys than in any other camp die here from the effects of bad weather. It is now the cold season and on account of extreme cold the sepoys must have abstained from a bath for the last three months and their bodies must be very unclean. Notwithstanding such a state of things, the sepoys at Quetta do not, like those at Aden, get batta in addition to rations. The weather at Quetta is moist and every sepoy is compelled to spend about three rupees every month in spirituous drinks. A sepoy there gets, including rations, about 13 rupees per mensem, all of which he must spend to keep himself in health; but, in order to be able to send some money to his family in India, he is obliged to underfeed himself and this partial starvation exposes him to diseases that soon close his career. The province of Sind is included in the Bombay Presidency, and yet the military sepoys there get batta. There is no good reason to exclude the sepoys located at Quetta from this favour, and it is to be hoped that Government will soon bestow it on them.

Complaints in connection with the revision survey in Wái.

23. The Vrittasár (71), in its issue of the 25th February, says that a general notification has been published that the revision survey of the land in the town of Wái will commence from a certain date, that the land-owners not being informed of the particular day on which their land will be re-surveyed they have to dance attendance on the surveyors, who do not survey their lands in the order of their distinctive numbers and do not inform the owners of the result of their re-survey, and that it is unjust to throw on the rayats the expenses of the revision survey, which is made solely in the interests of Government. The paper adds that it is not aware of any rule of the Survey Department or of any Government Resolution laying down that the expenses of land survey should be paid by the people. It will be oppression on the people if the Collector forcibly recovers from them these expenses.

A suggestion to the Police Superintendent of Kánara in connection with gamblers in the district.

24. The Kannadă Suvárte (144), in its issue of the 22nd February, writes:—The Police Superintendent of Kánara is no doubt aware that the Shivarátri festival at Gokarn is fast approaching. The gambling gentry of the district is sure to muster strong at the place, which has become the head-quarters of some of the notorious and hardest gamblers, who carry on their nefarious trade till the festival ends. This is the cause of all the thefts and other serious crimes that generally occur during the festival. Cannot the energetic Police Superintendent take any measures to prevent this annual meeting of the gamblers?

Thefts of crops at Waduth.

25. A correspondent from Waduth, writing to the Vártáhar (19) in its issue of the 24th February, says that the agriculturists of Waduth have been suffering much annoyance and loss at the hands of about 40 robbers who have come from Vardhangad and settled in the village called A'rphal, and that along with some twenty robbers who are inhabitants of A'rphal they recently cut down and removed the crops of shálu extending over about seven acres, and remarks that it is the misfortune of the poor agriculturists that daring robberies should be committed under the British rule and that no attempt should be made by the police to check them. The paper requests Government to oblige the rayats by doing the needful in the matter without delay.

PART II.—Education.

Alleged inconsistency in the public utterances of His Excellency Lord Reay and the educational policy enunciated by the Bombay Government in a resolution issued in response to a memorial from the inhabitants of Ahmednagar.

26. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 25th February, writes:—The resolution issued by the Bombay Government in response to a memorial from the inhabitants of Ahmednagar only reiterates the lines of policy foreshadowed by His Excellency Lord Reay in his speech at the Elphinstone College. Our only embarrassment on reading the speech and the resolution is that the spirit of the latter does not seem to be consistent with the assurance given by His Excellency in the speech that no retrenchment has been made or is contemplated in the educational grant. The resolution breathes the same spirit of parsimony and illiberality towards education which Government were credited with before His Excellency Lord Reay made the speech. The settled policy of Government in regard to high schools is now stated to consist in "the retention of certain model schools in which fees should be gradually raised and private benefactions invited, and the retention of high schools elsewhere only when the deficiency of the present receipts, as compared with the expenditure, is made up by increased fees, or by private benefactions, or by both." In regard to lower secondary education the policy is "to retire in favour of private enterprise wherever it is possible to do so without injury to education." This seems to us a very unhappy statement of the Government policy, since as put here it makes the increase of fees, private benefactions and retirement in favour of private enterprise the principal elements of the policy, and gives quite a secondary place to education itself. But construing it by the light of Lord Reay's declared opinions we are unwilling to believe that education occupies a subordinate place in the estimation of Government. We do not think that Government are actuated by any distrust or fear of education such as is exhibited by certain reactionists. We own that they are in full sympathy with education and are not hostile to its progress. But in regard to the means of securing that progress, we find a diversity in profession and practice. In his speech Lord Reay was profuse in his promises, and even boasted that whatever departments suffered from the shears of retrenchment, education has not suffered and will not suffer from them. The resolution, on the other hand, makes the increase of fees and private benefactions the chief props of education, and should these props give way the death-knell of education would be sounded in no uncertain manner. This policy effects a compromise between the two opposing views of the out-and-out abolitionists on the one hand and the advocates of full maintenance of education on the other; and like most compromises it will not give full satisfaction to either party. We welcome it as far as it goes. The promise to maintain model high schools is a gain. The equipment of high schools on the most approved European methods (that is what we understand by the proposal to create model high schools) will be a decided improvement. We welcome the measure on the distinct understanding that the model schools proposed to be formed will really be brought to such a state of efficiency as that of Eton, or Harrow, or Rugby, or any other of the public schools in England or the Continent. The superior modes of appliances of instruction, the highly refined discipline, the elevated tone of character, the inspiring nature of the surroundings and the other attributes which we are told characterize a good European public school must be infused into our model schools. We mean no disparagement of our present school managers when we say that none of our schools, Government or private, realize such an ideal. If any of the Government schools are to be made model schools, they will have to be remodelled a great deal before they can be made so. If Government regard their present high schools as efficient enough to serve as model institutions, we have no cause for rejoicing over the proposal. If the present schools are to be models, what must be the copies? The model must be perfect, containing all its component parts in a finished state. It must be really worthy of its high position and should strike awe and reverence by its superiority. With the other portion of the policy we cannot reconcile ourselves. No financial pinch which Government may feel justifies in our opinion the policy which is practically one of withdrawal. The increase of fees has been pronounced by Mr. Chatfield himself as the signal for the general emptying of our schools. As for any private benefactions, it is too much to expect the backward and comparatively poor communities in mofussil stations to make up an amount sufficient to permanently maintain a high school. The community of Ahmednagar petition for the retention of the high school and Government chaff it as being ready to pay the price. We think that it will be little short of a miracle if these communities are able to keep up high schools at their own cost. It is no fault of the communities if they are not so ready. They are yet in an infant condition, and they look for guidance and support from Government. This guidance and support Government are as much interested in giving as the communities are in receiving them. Surely it is as much the duty as the interest of an enlightened Government to make its subjects enlightened, and if Government fail in this duty the consequences will not be felt by the people alone. True statesmanship consists in not merely devising clever measures, but in adapting them to local conditions. If Government perceive, as we cannot help thinking they do, that the increase of fees and private benefactions are impossible conditions on which to make the existence of high schools depend, they ought not to be surprised if they are charged with a conscious endeavour to stop education. It is impossible to believe that Government are unconscious that the eventual result of their action will be the abolition of a large number of high schools and the non-appearance of any other institution of equal usefulness in their place. We sincerely regret that His Excellency Lord Reay, who has been so deservedly popular for his liberal instincts and upright administration, should have been identified with such a disastrous policy. We fear that His Lordship allows himself too readily to be impressed by some crochetty influences around him. If so, the sooner they are shaken off the better.

Ráo Sáheb V. N. Mandlik's election as Dean in Arts of the Bombay University approved.

27. The same paper observes:—We are glad that the members of the Faculty of Arts of our University have elected Ráo Sáheb V. N. Mandlik to be their Dean for the ensuing year. It is a good selection, and we are all the more glad because this is the first time in the history of our University when a Native gentleman, himself a distinguished alumnus of the leading Arts College of this presidency, has been chosen for this honour, hitherto conferred on Europeans. The University, as the highest seat of learning and intellectual activity, is concerned with no race and no class distinctions and is expected in all matters which come within its purview to deal with men without any reference to their race. In selecting a Native gentleman as Dean in Arts the members of that Faculty have shown that they are mindful of the principle which the University is expected to adopt, and they have moreover set an example which, it is to be hoped, will be followed by other bodies. [Several other papers approve of Mr. Mandlik's election as Dean in Arts of the Bombay University.]

The Bombay University Examinations and the necessity for reviving the system of granting grace-marks.

28. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 24th February, writes:—It is sad that the Bombay University authorities, after an experience of 30 years of the working of that institution, should be unable to regulate the conduct of its examinations and to prevent sudden fluctuations in the tests and other freaks which inflict undeserved hardship and injustice on candidates. We need not go into the details of these irregularities. They are all well-known. Some 55 students, who apparently failed at the last Matriculation, are now declared to have passed, and this has been the result of a protest of the Principal of one of the schools against the Sanskrit portion of that examination. The paper in Sanskrit is believed to have been irrationally hard, and the examiner, by setting it, is shown to have proved his unfitness for that duty. But this is not the only instance. The Second Examination in Medicine was equally difficult as only 9 out of 63 candidates passed; and the inference is inevitable that the class was either exceptionally stupid and ill-taught, or that the examination was unreasonably hard. Is it impossible to take any general precaution by which to regulate the standard reasonably? The test may be raised deliberately and with previous intimation, but such haphazard and unexpected interference with it, simply at the whim or caprice of one or more of the examiners, is little short of stabbing the poor students in the dark and entailing on them needless labour and waste of time, money and energy. In giving up its control over the results and in abolishing the system of granting grace-marks, by which evident injustice and hardship were corrected, the Syndicate seems to us to have acted unwisely; and in one or two cases, we believe, it had this year to actually grant grace-marks in spite of the abolition of that system. If it is impossible to constitute a board of examiners with some elements of permanency in it, ensuring a reasonable degree of continuity of tests similar to what we are told exists in England, or if it be not practicable to exercise supervision over the question-papers before they are printed and set, the grace-marks system ought to be reverted to and all doubts and disputes avoided by a fixed maximum number of marks being granted to make up the minimum required by the standard as a means of meeting a possible error in the assessment of answers by the examiners and preventing the failure of a candidate who had virtually passed the examination. The soundness and the force of this principle have been practically admitted by the amendments which have been effected in the results of some of the recent examinations, independently of the opinions of the examiners. Why then should not the old rule be revived? We have at the head of the University a Vice-Chancellor of practical knowledge and sagacity. Dr. Mackichan has already done much for the hard-worked candidate. We hope that he may now have the opportunity of improving the system, or at least of placing it so far as may be beyond the reach of individual whim or caprice.

Educational officers in the Kánara District and their attitude towards private schools.

29. A correspondent of the Kannadă Suvárte (144), in its issue of the 22nd February, remarks:—Having resided in other districts for a long time, I am able to say that the educational officers there do not give so much trouble to private educational institutions as in this out-of-the-way North Kánara District, which is far behind others, as far as education is concerned.

30. Another correspondent, writing to the same newspaper, says:—Private school enterprise, it seems, has become to the Educational Department of this district what the modern electro-homeopathy seems to prove to allopathy, or what in another line free-thought has been to the order of priesthood. If private institutions are permitted to succeed, the immediate step Government would take would be, as the Department seems most certainly to believe, to abolish a number of Deputy and Sub-Deputy Inspectorships. Such an idea seems ridiculous on the very face of it. Still I am sorry that this foolish idea is entertained in all seriousness by the Educational Department here. And hence its otherwise unaccountable opposition to private educational enterprise. I assure the educational officers that they need not be so nervous at the thought of the prosperity of private institutions, for it cannot go against their interests. Government will have to keep an inspecting staff, even though each and every school in the district may happen to be under private management. The only difference will be that the inspecting staff will cease to exercise that sweet, uncontrolled power which it now possesses over the fate of hundreds of wretchedly ill-paid school-masters. Perhaps here it is that the shoe pinches. But I assure officers that they need not despair so soon. It will take at least a century more for private enterprise, under such direct and official opposition, to grow into a body able enough to manage all the schools of Kánara. Hence this unseemly opposition is quite unnecessary at such an early stage. And even if they persist in their opposition, I emphatically declare that it will be impossible for them to put down this most useful and necessary enterprise notwithstanding all their underhand dealings, as it has already taken deep roots in the soil of benighted Kánara.

Part III.—Railways.

Falsity of the remark made by the Honourable Mr. Scoble that no Native third-class passenger travels beyond forty-one miles at a stretch pointed out.

31. The Din Bandhu (7), in its issue of the 24th February, writes:—The Honourable Mr. Scoble, so well-known for his certain judicial measures, and amongst them for his Debtors' Act, has lately, after a most laborious diving into the mysteries of railway figures, arrived at the conclusion that no Native third-class passenger travels beyond forty-one miles at a stretch. We shall for the present confine our remarks to Poona and Bombay. Poona is 119 miles from Bombay; therefore no third-class passenger travels from Poona to Bombay or vice versâ, because no third-class passenger travels beyond forty-one miles. Had the Honourable Mr. Scoble looked into the statistics of the Bombay population, or had he enquired of the Railway Company how many third-class passengers travel between the two stations, he would have immediately discovered the falsity of his most astounding proposition. Nearly 210,000 third-class passengers travel every month between Bombay and Poona. Mr. Scoble's object in arriving at the above-mentioned proposition was to show that there was no necessity for providing latrines in third-class carriages. There is an unanimous cry that in most of the Indian railways the comforts of third-class passengers are not at all attended to, and this cry having reached the higher quarters, has produced the proposition in question to stifle public opinion. We have shown that the statement is not at all tenable and wait to see what further measures are adopted by Government to compel railway companies to make third-class travelling more comfortable than it is at present.

Acceleration of the Indian mail trains suggested.

32. The Jáme Jamshed (109), in its issue of the 27th February, once more recommends that the speed of the Indian mail trains should be increased in order to effect a saving of time that is now unnecessarily consumed, observing that the mail train on the B. B. & C. I. Railway leaving Colába at 6 P.M. takes an hour and a quarter to pass the Bandora station, and that this long delay can be easily curtailed.

Part IV.—Municipalities.

Qualifications of voters and candidates for municipal commissionerships.

33. The Shri Shiváji (61), in its issue of the 22nd February, expresses satisfaction with the recent municipal ward elections in Poona, says that the system of electing their representatives by the people being a new one in India the right of voting should not be extended so soon to the ignorant and illiterate classes, that if persons knowing how to read and write were alone allowed to vote they would not abuse the privilege, and that the progress of education would be encouraged thereby, and asks whether it is not necessary for Government to rule that candidates for municipal commissionerships should be educated men and should possess a good knowledge of the English language.

Local self-government at Surat.

34. A correspondent, writing to the Gujaráti (78) in its issue of the 24th February, says:—I assure you that the much-abused pleader-members of the Surat Municipal Corporation are the real friends of local self-government and that they try their utmost to prevent people from making the municipal department an easy field for patronising the lucky folks who are intimate with certain high officials in this city. This you will at once infer from the report of the municipal meeting of the 31st ultimo. The way in which a high and responsible officer defended the municipal secretary, when the irregularities and the inaccuracies of the latter's diary had made the document utterly useless for municipal record, is simply astounding. This, coupled with the same gentleman's unparliamentary manner of addressing the chairman, has placed it beyond question that the real enemies of local self-government are some officials and their adorers and not the much-maligned Vakils. How some Government officials, high and low, try to make local self-government a farce by means scarcely justifiable, I will say hereafter.

Recent general municipal elections in Ahmedabad and the scheme of local self-government.

35. The same newspaper writes:—The recent general municipal elections in Ahmedabad must have convinced the enemies of local self-government of the anxiety of the mofussil Native public to take part in the management of municipal affairs. It is really creditable to Ahmedabad that the voters and the candidates for election should have displayed the same interest in the elections there as that shown in Bombay on a similar occasion last month. The different candidates in Ahmedabad sent letters to the voters in their respective wards asking them to vote for them, and even lectured before voters' meetings about the work they would do as municipal commissioners. In many cases the candidates, who had secured the confidence of the voters at such meetings, have succeeded in being returned to the corporation. This fact clearly shows that the voters can be duped no longer by those who seek their suffrages. The seed of local self-government in this country was sown only a short time back by the illustrious Lord Ripon, and it is certainly gratifying to the Native public to find the mofussilites appreciating the boon so highly within such a short time. The interest evinced by the public in municipal elections will not to a great extent fail in bringing nearer the time for the extension of the rights enjoyed by it as regards the management of its provincial affairs, signs of the approach of which seem to be looming in the distance. [The Ahmedabad papers also express satisfaction with the result of the recent municipal elections in their town.]

A complaint in connection with the general municipal elections recently held in Ahmedabad.

36. The Nyáyadarshak (122), in its issue of the 25th February, complains of some Government and municipal servants having used their influence on behalf of some candidates and of having been present at some polling stations on the occasion of the general municipal elections held in Ahmedabad on the 15th and 18th February, in contravention of a Government resolution on the subject, and of some irregularities practised at some of the polling offices, says that it is prepared to give the names of the defaulting Government and municipal servants and to prove the complaint made by it, and requests the Bombay Government to ask it directly to give an explanation instead of asking the municipal president of Ahmedabad about it. [The Ahmedabad Times (86) of the 26th February also complains of Government servants taking part in the recent municipal elections in Ahmedabad in contravention of a resolution on the subject, and hopes that the Government of His Excellency Lord Reay will duly punish the defaulters in order to set an example to other Government servants.]

A suggestion to the Dákor Municipality.

37. The Hindustán (108), in its issue of the 24th February, disapproves of the Dákor Municipality levying a tax of one anna on every pilgrim to the town, points out the necessity for exempting or levying a nominal fee from poor pilgrims, such as those from Umreth and other neighbouring villages, the Dhebariás and others, and requests the municipality and Mr. Sheppard, Commissioner, N. D., to attend to the matter.

PART V.—Native States.

A request to His Highness the Mahárája Scindia on the subject of cow-killing in India.

38. The Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 18th February, publishes a letter addressed by Mr. P. V. Támbolkar to His Highness the Mahárája Scindia of Gwalior, in which the writer gives a history of the sanad obtained by the great-great-grandfather of the present Mahárája from the then Moghal Emperor A'lamgir, in which the Emperor had consented to prevent cow-killing in the country extending from the eastern to the western sea and bounded on the north and on the south by the Himálaya and the Vindhia mountains respectively, and earnestly requests His Highness to find out the sanad from old records and to urge the British Government to carry it out, inasmuch as Her Majesty Queen Victoria has assumed the title of the Empress of India in a grand Darbár held at Delhi in 1877, this title being formerly borne by the Moghal Emperors.

Dacoities in the Gwalior State.

39. A correspondent of the Pandit (162), in its issue of the 1st March, says:—Dacoities are committed every month at one or two villages of the Ambáh Pargana of the Bhivand district in the Gwalior State. The villages of Kanhári, Gaheli, Gingirakhi, Gáto, Moghna, Madanpura and several others have suffered from this evil and the dacoits have not been yet arrested. In the time of the late Mahárája Jayáji Ráo Scindia, the State was free from this crime, which has appeared since his death on account of the separation of civil and criminal authority which was then vested in the person of the Subha of a zilla.

The people and the Native Princes of Káthiáwár and a petition prepared by the editor and proprietor of the Rájyabhakt newspaper to His Excellency Lord Reay on their behalf.

40. The Rájyabhakt (127), in its issue of the 26th February, publishes a petition drawn up by its editor and proprietor, Mr. Girjáshankar Káshirám Dvivedi, a native of Káthiáwár, and addressed to His Excellency Lord Reay on behalf of the 50 lákhs of people of Káthiáwár, who, he says, suffer from innumerable hardships, injustice and calamities. The petition, which is about to be presented to His Excellency and of which the first instalment only is now given, states that the Káthiáwár public suffers more hardships than the slaves of Africa, that it envies the neighbouring British subjects enjoying independence and pure justice which it does not enjoy, that numerous cases have happened in the province in which the mighty have with the help of Government political officers crushed down the weak, and that the Political Department is the source of the innumerable hardships and the slavery of the Káthiáwáris, and that it would be difficult to find among the Native Princes in the province more than one or two Rájás who have not kept mistresses, have not given themselves up to drink, have not been puppets in the hands of their Kárbháris and who wish to make their subjects happy. The petition in question is published by the editor in order that out of the thousands of persons who, he says, have given information with their signatures attached thereto and at their own risk, those who may be timid may have an opportunity of withdrawing and those who may be bold may come forward in the matter.

The Native States in Káthiáwár and the political officers in that province.

41. The same newspaper says that the political officers in Káthiáwár are day by day becoming more and more powerful and tyrannical in the matter of their sway over the Native Princes in that province, complains of their interference in the matter of the nomination of Kárbháris by the Native Princes, which interference it thinks to be illegal, quotes the instance of the appointment of Mr. Maganlál as Kárbhári in Jámnagar, of Mr. Hematrám in Dhrol, of Mr. Sámalbhái in Mángrol, of Mr. Chunilál in Pálitána, of Mr. Ratilál in Wadhwán, and of Mr. Haribhái in Junágad in support of its complaint, points out the disadvantages accruing to the Rájás and to the Political Agency by the nomination as Kárbháris of men chosen of by the political officers, and remarks that until the powers of the latter, who are military men, be fixed by Government, such misconduct is not likely to be stopped. The paper remarks that it is said that there is an old Government resolution which forbids the appointment of persons serving in the Political Agency to Kárbhárships in Native States, cannot understand why the resolution in question is not enforced, and adds that Government should take speedy measures in the matter. [The Hitechchhu (80) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 28th February, complains of the Political Agents lording it over the Native Princes and of their interference in all the affairs of the latter, points out the necessity for Government defining their work with the Rájás, and hopes that Government will move in the matter in order to stop the Native Princes from continuing as slaves of these officers.]

An alleged attempt on the part of the Rádhanpur State to bribe the Political Agency.

42. In a controversy between the Din Mani (74) newspaper of Broach and the Nyáyadarshak (122), the latter, in its issue of the 25th February, observes:—The Din Mani, which writes in advocacy of the Rádhanpur State, says that the Political Agency has not reported much against the management of that State. We do not at once believe this statement to be true. "A few months ago, when the camp of the Agency was at Rádhanpur, the Chopdár of the State went to the camp at night with a bag of rupees. He fell down, having struck against a peg of the tent, and the rupees were scattered on the ground. What has become of these rupees?" If the advocate of Rádhanpur gives a satisfactory explanation of the matter, we shall thank him for it.

The approaching municipal elections in Berár.

1. The Vaidarbh (2), in its issue of the 23rd February, writes:—The 1st of April next is fixed for the election of members of the municipalities in Berár. If we recollect well, the rules under which the elections are to be held provide that the list of voters shall be prepared and published at least six weeks before the date fixed for them. Now the order communicating the date for elections was received, at least by the Akola Municipal Committee, on the 14th instant, i.e., only one day previous to the six weeks immediately preceding the date fixed for elections. That municipality has therefore only one day to prepare and publish the lists of voters! Further, under the rules, the lists of voters are to be prepared by the secretary of the committee or such officer as the Deputy Commissioner may appoint. Now the latter officer had not, if we are not incorrectly informed, up to the 15th instant designated any person to prepare the lists. The municipality had no legally appointed secretary, the result being that not only little or no time was allowed for the publication and preparation of the lists, but there was no person who could with authority and legality prepare and publish them. When such instances happen, it is high time that Government should avail themselves of non-official assistance, if for no other reason, to stop the complaints made by the people. For if the non-official public were to be less vigilant than Government officers, it would be less severe towards the latter, seeing that it is subject to the same failings which in its imagination have been the peculiar qualifications of the official classes.

Explanation in a certain matter asked from a wrong party by the Judicial Commissioner in Berár.

2. The same newspaper says that a Deputy Commissioner of a certain district illegally confined an accused person in a dark room, and that when the Resident wrote to the Judicial Commissioner, Colonel Mackenzie, to enquire into the matter, the latter asked the clerk of the court of the Deputy Commissioner in question to give an explanation. The proper person, the paper observes, who should have been asked to furnish an explanation is the Deputy Commissioner. No doubt some lazy Deputy Commissioners get important things done by their clerks, but this practice cannot but be condemned. It is quite undesirable that a clerk of the court should be entrusted with highly important work. If the Judicial Commissioner had properly considered the matter, he would certainly have seen his mistake in asking for an explanation from the clerk of the court in the case in question.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Part I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Necessity for the Indian administration being consonant with the wishes of the people.

1. The Dnyán Ságar (28), in its issue of the 4th March, says:—There is not the least doubt that if Government treat the people of India in opposition to their wishes, there will be produced in the country some day or other men like George Washington, who will inspire the people with patriotism and achieve their freedom. Considerate Englishmen like Mr. Gladstone admit that the days have gone by when such a large mass of educated Natives could, by hook or by crook, be kept under control. There are, however, some Englishmen who fondly imagine that England, who does not yield even to her sister country Ireland, will not let the barbarians in India do any harm to her, but properly speaking there is no comparison between the two countries. Compared with India, Ireland is but a dot in the map of the world or like a clod of earth in front of a mountain. What is true of Ireland with its sterile land, bad climate and poor inhabitants cannot hold good in the case of India with its fertile land and krors of people. What a great disparity there is between powerful India, where the mere mention of the word 'cartridge' caused rivers of blood to flow and the Topiwálás (lit. wearers of hats; Europeans) to flee away for very life, and the poor and raving Ireland! Strange is the prowess of the people of India! Once they entertain the desire of having anything, Indian heroes will put aside their mutual differences and will even shed blood for the sake of its fulfilment. Did caste distinction come in the way in 1857? Pieces of bread were circulated from village to village without any let or hindrance. Not a single Musalman looked askance when Vishvásráo Peshwa was placed on the throne of Delhi. Did the Hindus receive assistance from the Topiwálás when a flood of blood was created on the field of Pánipat of world-wide reputation? The Mahomedans are trying hard to obstruct the Indian National Congress and some Anglo-Indian newspapers are instigating them, and with a view to ridiculing it are meanly giving a national assembly like the Congress epithets such as a "Hindu Congress" and others. This, instead of damping our spirit, will serve to sharpen our efforts for the accomplishment of our aim and object. There are krors of Hindus occupying different parts of the country from the Himálaya to Cape Comorin, speaking different dialects and languages and belonging to different classes, and they are bound together by ties of brotherhood which under the kind British rule are getting day by day more and more close. All of us believe in the same religion and worship the same gods, though in different languages. Our brotherhood is thus proved to be very ancient and we have all of us the same grievances and the same joys. Though, therefore, not only the Musalmans but even the Pársis, Eurasians, Jews and other alien races were to propitiate the English people and become their favourites, they would, we are sure, be able to do us no harm whatever. It is absurd to first educate the people a little and give them a taste of local self-government and then to withdraw from them these benefits and to think of ruling over them by keeping them under the thumb. Before this we were in a condition of ignorance, and consequently we did not understand the tactics of the wily British rulers and so everything went on smoothly. But now that we have got the light of knowledge, shall we be groping our way in the dark? Corrupt British officers have begun to appear to us like enemies and the present retrenchment policy in the Educational Department has become unbearable. Under these circumstances the administration of the country must be conducted on principles approved of by us.

Distrust of the natives of India by Government and its baselessness.

2. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 7th March, disputes the truth of the assertion said to be made by many Anglo-Indians that the English have acquired dominion in India by means of the sword, considers the acquisition and maintenance of the British Indian Empire to be due rather to the ignorance and want of unity prevailing among the natives of the country than to the bravery and heroism of the English people, whose strength in India, the paper says, lies in the disunion and ignorance of their Native subjects, and remarks that the English are afraid that if the people of India are educated they will have a hard struggle with them, and that with a view to avoid it they are encouraging ignorance and mutual feuds among them and have taken precautionary measures such as the passing of the Arms' Act, the restriction that in the army Natives shall not be promoted beyond a certain rank, the rule that the European and British soldiers should not be furnished with the same kind of weapons, the exclusion of Natives from volunteer corps and from posts of executive power and the rest. The paper adds that the people are, however, educated and clearly see the deception practised by Government, that if they were not loyal the measures taken by Government by way of precaution would be of no avail, and that the distrust of the subject-people by the British rulers is unnecessary, as the former heartily wish for the company of the latter, at least for a century more.

Reasons set forth for the omission of India from the Queen's speech and remarks thereon.

3. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 3rd March, writes :—India was ignored in the Queen's speech, and the reason assigned is that it was owing to the prosperity which prevailed there at present ! What happy news this for our Finance Minister and the local Governments who are scrambling over lákhs of rupees of the revenue to adjust their respective balance sheets and to keep together the body and soul of the administrative machinery, and dragging to the brink of the provincial precipice such luxuries as public education and medical relief amidst a population which counts the ignorant at 95 per cent. and whose indigenous modes of medication excite the horror of Englishmen and Englishwomen ! One is at a loss to know what to say to this degree of knowledge of the India Office as to the affairs of India and this mode of dealing with the affairs of her millions. If England had to bear any share of the cost of the Indian Government, as we submit she is bound to bear at least a half share of its imperial charges, all would, as if by magic, begin to go straight, and such transparent treatment, or rather ill-treatment, of grave Indian questions as that which is illustrated in the present instance would become impossible. What more significant hint is needed for the Indian party ? [Some other newspapers also consider this explanation of the omission of India from the Queen's speech poor and unsatisfactory, and say that India is far from prosperous.]

The prospect of reduction in the salt-duty hailed with delight.

4. The Indu Prakásh (12) of the 4th March is very glad that the grievances of India in respect to the increase in the salt-duty from Rs. 2 to Rs. 2½ have attracted attention in Parliament, though they have been unheeded by the Government of India, and says that it is astonishing that the Supreme Government should not have even dreamt of reducing the duty when the fact of the diminished consumption of that article having been the consequence of the rise in the duty was clearly before their eyes, and that even though the duty be now reduced the people will not credit Government with anxiety for the welfare of the subject-people, but will consider it to be a victory gained by the Indian National Congress and will thank it for the same. [Several other papers express delight at the prospect of reduction in the salt-duty held out by the reply given by Lord Cross to a question in Parliament on the subject.]

Lord Cross' assurance regarding the reduction in the Indian salt-duty and a request to His Lordship to carry it out.

5. The same newspaper writes :—The assurance recently given by Lord Cross in the House of Lords that the salt-duty would be reduced at an early date shows that the India Office and the Government of India are beginning to find that the people of India were right when they protested strongly against the increase in the salt-duty effected by Lord Dufferin. How far Lord Cross will be able to carry out this assurance it is difficult to say, for the position of our finances is by no means such that the Government of India will be easily able to lessen any of the burdens it has imposed upon the people.

6. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 3rd March, writes :—There is hope for a Government so long as it has the courage to acknowledge a mistake and to correct it. The raising of the salt-duty was a mistake as much from the revenue as from the humanitarian point. The public press in India almost unanimously objected to the enhancement. We showed in these columns as plainly as could be that a reversal of the Ripon-Baring policy would not last And sooner than we expected we are now promised a complete vindication of that policy. May the lesson last longer than the mistake! It is a hopeful sign, as we have said, that in this matter the authorities do not cling to their mistake. But we wish they saw a little beyond the revenue point of it. Do they not see what this threatened loss in revenue means? It means disease and possibly death for thousands of human beings, and many more thousands of cattle.

Sir Edward Watkins and alleged Russian influence in India.

7. The Indu Prakásh (12) of the 4th March and many other papers of the week censure Sir Edward Watkins for charging the natives of India in general with being favourably disposed towards the Russians and keeping in their houses portraits of Their Imperial Majesties the Czar and the Czarina and those who exert themselves in the cause of the Indian National Congress with receiving money from Russia, and challenge him to substantiate his accusations.

The London Times and the forged letters attributed to Mr. Parnell, M.P.

8. The same newspaper writes:—At last Nemesis has overtaken the London Times, and for once that influential organ of public opinion in England is compelled to own that it has allowed itself to be deceived. Its articles on "Parnellism and crime" had created a profound sensation in England, and the letters which it ascribed to Mr. Parnell, M.P., but which the latter stoutly denied to be his, were taken hold of by the Conservatives and the Liberal Unionists for the purpose of discrediting the cause of the Irish. But the attempt of the Times to make out by means of the letters that Mr. Parnell had instigated murders has completely broken down and that paper now stands discredited before the bar of public opinion. The Times has, it is now clear, been misled and deceived and its reputation has suffered considerably. We are glad of this for one reason. That paper has of late lent itself to those who have been opposed to the cause of just administration in India. Its Calcutta correspondent has been misleading it often, and the manner in which he has used the columns of the Times for the purpose of opposing the reasonable claims of the people of this country to a share in its administration has not been marked by a sense of fairness. The Times will no longer be able to speak with the voice of authority on any question, for the English public will now hesitate to accept its statements as gospel truths after the exposure of the forged letters. The Times has merited the fate that has overtaken it, and it is to be hoped that the lesson will not be lost upon it and its Calcutta correspondent. [Several other newspapers express satisfaction with the defeat of the London Times in its action against Mr. Parnell, M.P.]

His Excellency Lord Reay praised for his zeal for the public good.

9. In an article headed "A model ruler, indeed," the Kaiser-i-Hind (112), in its issue of the 3rd March, refers to a remark made by His Excellency Lord Reay in his speech last week at the laying of the foundation-stone of the European General Hospital, Bombay, that he had firmly resolved not to have a new Government House until he had laid the foundation-stone of the Hospital in question, notwithstanding the great pressure brought to bear upon him from high quarters to sanction the erection of a new Government House, and says that it is now no longer a secret that Lord Reay is really an impartial ruler, having the greatest zeal for the good of the subject-people and willing to sacrifice his comfort for it, that Bombay is fortunate in possessing such a Governor, that it does not get such rulers always, and that it therefore desires that he may be able to carry out works of public interests before his retirement from office in April 1890. The paper adds that those Europeans who have improperly raised their voice against His Excellency in the matter of the Crawford case should be ashamed of themselves after learning of the above fact in connection with the European General Hospital and should mend their error, that they should know that he does not wish ill of Mr. Crawford, and that he is not such a person as would attach any weight to the intrigues of Bráhmans against that officer. [The Gujarát Gazette (77), in its issue of the 7th March, also praises His Excellency Lord Reay for his zeal in the cause of public good, and observes that Government should allow such a good ruler to continue longer in office, and that the public will ever remember Lord Reay's good deeds in the same way as those of Lord Ripon.]

Cartoons in the Pársi Punch about the Crawford case.

10. The Pársi Punch (124), in its issue of the 3rd March, contains a cartoon representing a European Civil Servant reading a newspaper article with a bull-dog lying near him. The letter-press runs thus:—Mr. Jones (A civilian reading an article on the Crawford case in the Bombay Gazette)— Deuced nice paper! Takes a very sensible view of the whole thing. What a sham-virtuous outcry they make against the Native subordinate Magistrates? Too "cowardly, brutal and unjust!" In another cartoon His Excellency Lord Reay is represented as Hercules cleansing the Augean stable of "corruption, bribery, jobbery," and "abuse of power" in the Commissionership, Central Division, by throwing the water of "enquiry" from a water-pipe into the stable containing cattle. The letter-press is as follows:—Hercules in the Augean stable; or, Lord Reay's stupendous task.

Disapproval of the attack of some Anglo-Indian and English newspapers upon the Bombay Government and the defence of the latter's conduct in giving indemnity to Native Magistrates who gave evidence in the Crawford case.

11. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 3rd March, censures the conduct of some of the English and Anglo-Indian newspapers in attacking His Excellency Lord Reay for ordering an enquiry into the charges of corruption which had been for many years past openly made by the public against Mr. A. T. Crawford and by a reference to the trial of Lord Macclesfield justifies the action of the Bombay Government in giving indemnity to those Native Magistrates who had given bribes to Mr. Crawford to induce them to give evidence to that effect.

Agitation set up by the friends of Mr. A. T. Crawford against His Excellency Lord Reay in the matter of the Crawford case disapproved.

12. The Kaiser-i-Hind (112), in its issue of the 3rd March, enters a protest against the objectionable and false agitation set up for the last eight months against His Excellency Lord Reay by the friends of Mr. Arthur Crawford, and says that the theory of a Bráhman conspiracy against Mr. Crawford started by his advocates is false, that the principal object thereof is to bring His Excellency into disgrace, that it is the greatest insult to a cautious, impartial and noble ruler like Lord Reay, who has the welfare of the subject-people at heart, that it is a libel upon the Bombay Government, and that the feelings of all sensible inhabitants of Bombay cannot but be shocked by such a libel. The Kaiser adds that Lord Reay has only done his duty in the Wilson and the Crawford case, and that he deserves honour and encouragement for it. [A few other papers also take a similar view.]

Disapproval of the conduct of an English newspaper in calling Native Magistrates "abject scoundrels" and comments thereon.

13. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 3rd March, writes:—An English paper, losing its sense of dignity, responsibility and fairness in trying to defend Mr. Crawford, speaks of the Native Magistrates who gave evidence against that officer as "abject scoundrels." Our blood boils with indignation when we think that this opprobrious epithet is applied to men like Thakár, Deshpánde, Kelkar and others who have served the State honourably and conscientiously, who have never done anything to lose the confidence of their masters, and against whom even the most fastidious superior officers had not a word to say. It is these men who are called "abject scoundrels,"—and for what? For yielding under the most oppressive and cruel compulsion to the demands made upon them in the name of their superior officer, directly or indirectly. It is a pity that the Crawford Commission did not call upon Hanmantráo to say what were his ways of extorting money for the Sáheb from these men. We should then have had a full description of the method employed in each case. Hanmantráo is said to have made a statement before the special officers entrusted with this enquiry. It is further alleged that in this statement he has made a clean breast of everything and acknowledged freely what part he played in these disgraceful transactions. His story, they say, bears out the Mámlatdárs in many of their assertions. Hanmantráo would have confessed before he was convicted by the Magistrate, but it is alleged that hopes were held out to him to the last that he should not fear, and the poor man relying upon these false assurances and blinded by his false loyalty and gratitude held his tongue. The result is that he is rotting in jail, while—but we shall not say anything of that here. Our concern is with these two words "abject scoundrels." Mr. Crawford ran away, as if with the consciousness of guilt, prepared to place thousands of miles of water and land between himself and the avenging hand of justice. But he was only excited and was wild, and did not know what he was doing! He had but a very small income. He borrowed money and spent it like water. How did he mean to repay his creditors? Out of his pension, which would have been but a paltry pittance? But he was a generous man, very careless in money matters. That is all. He has served the State with great distinction. He effected considerable improvements. He laid individual members of society under deep obligations by favours conferred upon them. Such a man's conduct ought not to be judged of too critically—so counsels gratitude. Then there are his friends who have tried to force the hands of Government, who have vilified Native society, who have not scrupled to resort to questionable means in order to save their dear friend—a member of the "heaven-born" service—from disgrace. His Excellency Lord Reay and every other man, high as well as low, who has had anything to do with the proceedings against Mr. Crawford have been abused right heartily in the Anglo-Indian and the English press for holding on manfully to the cause of justice. Yet the Anglo-Indian and English newspapers are very honourable and the friends of Mr. Crawford are only actuated by a proper esprit de corps. With the Mámlatdárs the case is different. They are poor devils, for whom no one need care anything—no one of importance we mean, for the Native community might be expected to shed a tear or two over their fate. Justice is demanding a prey; let us all combine to sacrifice them in order that our friend may get out safely. And so the poor fellows are forthwith branded as "abject scoundrels."

Remarks in connection with the hue and cry raised against the retention in Government service of Mámlatdárs who have admitted having bought their offices.

14. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 4th March, writes:—The question about the Mámlatdárs who, it is said, have admitted having bought their offices is one which will of course be dealt with by the Secretary of State for India in due course. Those who have been calling upon the Government to remove these men from office have simply taken hold of the single fact that they paid bribes and bought their posts. But if the men are to be dealt with on the strength of their own admissions and statements, those admissions and statements must be considered fully. If from them it appears either that any kind of pressure was brought to bear upon them or that they paid bribes for the purpose of retaining their posts and not being transferred to other and more unhealthy places than those where they were employed, it would be unjust to set them down as men who had soiled their hands with corruption. If we are not mistaken, most of those who have admitted having paid bribes have, to take them at their own version, paid them to avoid inconvenient transfers or being unjustly passed over in the matter of promotion. The question about these Mámlatdárs is one which cannot be settled off-hand, and the cry raised about their removal has therefore been rightly regarded by many persons to be premature. The Secretary of State in consultation with the Government of Bombay will, it is to be hoped, give their case a most careful consideration and not be misled by those who are ready in one and the same breath to exculpate Mr. Crawford and to inculpate the Mámlatdárs.

The Bombay Government and the Mámlatdárs who have been deprived of their judicial powers.

15. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 3rd March, writes:—A few of the Mámlatdárs have been deprived of their judicial powers. We learn that orders have been issued to the several Collectors concerned that they should ask certain Mámlatdárs under their jurisdiction not to exercise their judicial powers. Now, if this deprivation of power be intended as a punishment for the offence which these men have confessed to have committed, we are constrained to say that the action of Government will not commend itself to any impartial critic. In the first place, have not other people made confessions similar to those which these men have made? Why have they not been similarly dealt with? Is the Government going to deal with individual cases here and there? Such a procedure will not only be absurd, considering the peculiar circumstances of the case, but will obviously be inconvenient and likely to lead to injustice. All are in the same boat and all must be judged with the same measure and at the same time. No one who has watched the case carefully can have failed to be struck with the fact that although there is a similarity in the offences committed by all, they are not identical. The difference between the actions of men like Thakár, Kelkar and Deshpánde and of men like Dabir is great and no Government which lays claim to judiciousness can ignore the difference. And yet we find that Ráo Sáheb Thakár's name is included in the list of those who have been deprived of their powers. Hence we fail to understand on what principle Government have acted in the matter. But apart from this question there is another point raised by these deprivations of powers. What has become of the guarantee given to these men by Government? If our information be correct, as we have every reason to believe it to be, the protection promised by Government extended also to promotion and rank. Now, does not deprivation of powers mean degradation? The public will interpret it as such and therefore it becomes necessary to examine the action of Government. "Hermit in the Mofussil," whose letter to the Pioneer we published in our last issue, has stated the case for the Government in such a masterly fashion that we have simply to refer to it in order to justify the guarantee given by Government. The guarantee was given and it was relied upon by these men, who, on the strength of the word of Government, freely opened their hearts. They confessed everything—even those things which they could not but feel were humiliating and would, if used against them, prove highly inconvenient. Government was enabled to enquire into the allegations against the ex-Commissioner, C. D., mainly by the evidence given by these witnesses. And what an irony of fate it is that Government should now turn round upon them and break its solemn word! It is a pity that this should be so, and we are especially grieved to think that this is done to satisfy the pressing demand of the Secretary of State for India. The hue and cry raised in the English press against the retention in their posts of Mámlatdárs who have given evidence in the Crawford case of a self-incriminating character has probably induced that high officer to peremptorily ask the Bombay Government to suspend the powers of these men and the latter has had to yield to the demand. That is the view taken in certain quarters. We are unwilling to admit it, because it would mean cowardice in men who have hitherto given us no reason to suspect them of it. Anyway the action of Government seems to us to be deplorable. [The Kesari (39), in its issue of the 5th March, also expresses the same sentiments.]

The Crawford case and the fate of the Mámlatdárs concerned in it.

16. The Jagadádarsh (34), in its issue of the 3rd March, says that in depriving only six Mámlatdárs of their magisterial powers Government seem to have thus dealt with only those who deposed to having purchased their offices, and requests Government not to keep the Mámlatdárs concerned in the Crawford case in their present state of suspense, but to relieve them of their anxiety by at once taking a final step with regard to them.

The Crawford case and a caution to Europeans with regard to Bráhmans.

17. The Din Bandhu (7), in its issue of the 3rd March, says:—It cannot be said that Mr. Crawford has been unnecessarily disgraced. "As you sow, so must you reap" is the rule of nature, and there is not the slightest objection to say that Mr. Crawford has been punished by God in accordance with this rule. We pity Mr. Crawford, because the very Bráhmans for whom he had a great liking have been the cause of his ruin. Europeans should take a warning from this and should not hereafter put much confidence in the people belonging to this class.

Retrenchments suggested in the Public Works Department.

18. Writing on the Public Works Department, the Kesari (39), in its issue of the 5th March, makes the following suggestions:—It is at present the duty of the Chief and Superintending Engineers to see whether the plans and estimates of works sent to them are correct or not, and the Public Works Secretary to Government has only to lay the papers before His Excellency the Governor in Council. This little work does not require the services of a Secretary, an Under Secretary, and an Assistant Secretary. Only the Under Secretary should be retained, he being placed under the Secretary for some other department, and the power of the Superintending Engineers with regard to minor works should be enlarged. The Chief Engineer does the same work as the Superintending Engineer and the responsibility of both is the same so far as their respective divisions are concerned, and therefore there should be no Chief Engineers, all being Superintending Engineers, as they are less expensive. There need not be more than one Executive Engineer at any place, as there are three at present in Poona. If necessary the Executive Engineer may have Assistant Engineers under him. Districts like Khándesh and Belgaum which have little work and have a railway passing through them need not have a separate Executive Engineer for each, one being sufficient for two of them, as is the case at present with Ratnágiri and Kolába. Much saving can thus be effected. In 1879 the total number of Engineers sanctioned by the Secretary of State for India was 888, but in 1886 their number was 1,035. Thus there were 147 Engineers in the service in excess of the sanctioned number. If those of this excess number, who were in this presidency, have not already been dispensed with, they should be dispensed with now. Measures should be adopted to close the Cooper's Hill College and the opinion of Sir John Strachey on the subject should be considered. The closure of this college will result in much saving. In 1884 the pay of every grade was unnecessarily raised. This should now be reduced, or at any rate there should be no more increase hereafter. The new Superintending Engineer's office created about a year ago is unnecessary and should be amalgamated with that of the Superintending Engineer for the Northern Division who lives in Bombay. Stores should not be ordered from England through the Secretary of State for India as that practice causes delay and is very expensive. There should be strict rules about travelling allowance. The paper then makes certain suggestions about the keeping and examination of accounts, and says that Government should consider them all before arriving at a conclusion in the matter.

Disapproval of the rumoured acting appointment of Mr. Pritchard to the Bombay Executive Council.

19. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 3rd March, writes :—A public announcement has been made, in a quarter usually well-informed, that Mr. Pritchard, Commissioner in Sind, will officiate in Council for the Honourable Mr. Richey, who has received leave on medical certificate from some date in May next. The announcement is inherently probable for more reasons than one; and in view of the vigorous attack which may shortly be expected from England on the ábkári policy of the Bombay Government it is of some public interest. Mr. Caine, M. P., was fairly justified in declaring, while in our midst, that in ábkári matters for a long time past Mr. Pritchard had been the real Governor in Council. Whatever may be thought of Mr. Pritchard's policy, this, at any rate, is emphatic testimony to his ability, zeal and strength of purpose; and his appointment at this precise juncture to succeed the Honourable Mr. Richey in Council would show that Government have made up their mind vigorously to defend their uncompromising position in ábkári matters. Some persons might reasonably think that Government would be wiser to adopt a more judicious and impartial attitude regarding a matter which is notoriously at issue. Mr. Pritchard, it strikes us, ought to be far more useful to Government as Commissioner in Sind than he could ever be as member of Council. He is a violent partisan, if ever there was one. He is also believed to be strongly and openly anti-Native. He is a man of marked force of character, but with no great culture and refinement; and having never served either as Collector of a District or Commissioner of a Division, he is little qualified to be a safe adviser of Government in the thousand and one questions that come before the Councillor in charge of the revenue portfolio. We are aware that these considerations often count for little in the present day. Mr. Pritchard will probably find himself in very congenial company at Bombay. He is by no means the only high official at head-quarters whose chief qualification it is that he has no local or district experience of the problems which he is required to solve. It is sometimes a distinct advantage not to know too much; and everyone will admit the delightful convenience of being able to solve the most knotty problems off-hand by the simple device of shutting the eyes and ignoring all arguments on the other side. This appears to be the popular departmental way of dealing with ábkári difficulties. Mr. Pritchard in Karáchi may do for the Sindhis; for our own part we should prefer a Councillor of a different temper and calibre. If he must come to Bombay, however, by right of seniority, let us hope that it will be to undo the mischief he has done as the head of the A'bkári Department.

20. The same newspaper writes:—If any illustration were wanted to add force to our remarks about Secretariat reform, it would, we think, be afforded by the recent appointment of Mr. Monteath to succeed Mr. Lee-Warner as Judicial and Political Secretary. Mr. Monteath is a man of undoubted ability and judgment, and has many claims to promotion. Amongst others he has served for many years in the Secretariat, and has thus acquired, according to the well-understood Bombay tradition, the rights of a watandár in that favoured sanctuary. But Mr. Monteath's official experience has so far been confined to the Revenue Department, and it is impossible for an inexperienced outsider to understand at first sight how an officer can possibly be qualified for the post of Judicial Secretary who has had no judicial experience, and how he can be qualified as Political Secretary without ever having held a political appointment or done any political work. We are aware that precisely the same objection can be raised, and in fact has been often raised, to Mr. Nugent's fitness for the post of Chief Secretary in charge of the Revenue Department; but two wrongs cannot make one right, and so long as Bombay Secretariat appointments are made on the present principle of appointing persons of no special experience, we cannot wonder if His Excellency the Governor in Council is often badly advised at head-quarters. The public, at any rate, would have greater confidence in the administration, if the Bombay Secretariat were manned on different principles. As long as district experience is plainly proscribed in the Secretariat, the Secretaries can hardly be expected to carry with the public that weight to which their high position entitles them. We must do His Excellency Lord Reay the justice to admit that he is not responsible for the groove into which Secretariat appointments have generally fallen, and that by Mr. Mackenzie's and Mr. Naylor's appointments on the occasions of vacancies he has shown that practical experience is not always disregarded. But is there really no way of providing for inconvenient permanent incumbents? Is the rule of "once a Secretary always a Secretary" to be considered a fixed principle of Bombay administration? If Mr. Nugent could be made, say, Commissioner somewhere, or be sent to Calcutta as Additional Member of the Viceroy's Council, Mr. Nugent himself would have no cause to complain; the public would congratulate him, and the Government would have a chance of re-organising the Secretariat. To suggest that any particular officers are indispensable and that they cannot be easily replaced in the Secretariat would be something like a libel on the Bombay Civil Service. Are none of the Collectors, or even the Divisional Commissioners, fit to hold the post of Revenue Secretary? Is there not a single District Judge or other experienced judicial officer who is available when wanted to fill the post of Judicial Secretary? If not, the Bombay tradition of a permanent Secretary may possibly be justified. But we cannot for a moment believe this, and are satisfied that the Bombay Government would be much strengthened in public estimation were the Secretariat made in Bombay, as in some other local Governments, the well-understood reward of successful district administration, either as Judge or Collector.

Suggestions regarding the appointment to the vacancy that will shortly occur in the Small Causes Court, Bombay, by the retirement of Mr. Warden, Second Judge.

21. The Yajdán Parast (143), in its issue of the 3rd March, says that Ráo Bahádur M. G. Ránade is fit in all respects to be appointed to the bench of the Small Causes Court, Bombay, in succession to Mr. Warden who is about to retire from it, and that his abilities and merits should be duly recognised by Government by nominating him to such a high post as that of the District Magistrate at the first convenient opportunity. The paper regrets that Mr. Hormasji Dádábhái, pleader, has very little chance of getting a seat on the bench of the Small Causes Court, Bombay, and remarks that Government cannot be blamed in the matter if they wish to give the appointment to one of their officers instead of to an outsider, as they have as far as practicable been doing up to this time in the matter of the bestowal of high posts. [The Káside Mumbai (113), in its issue of the 4th March, once more advocates the claims of the Mahomedans to a seat on the bench of the Small Causes Court, and suggests the name of Mr. Hakim, barrister, for the appointment.]

Disapproval of a large expenditure on a new building for the European General Hospital, Bombay.

22. The Satyă Shodhak (58), in its issue of the 3rd March, says that it is very surprising and much to be regretted that the Bombay Government, which owing to financial pressure was obliged to curtail its educational grant by a lákh and a half and is still applying the shears of retrenchment to that useful department, should have spared nine lákhs of rupees for a new building for the European General Hospital when there was already one appropriated solely for the purpose.

Alleged severity in the collection of the land revenue in the Dohad sub-division of the Panch Maháls.

23. The Satyodayă (132) of Dohad, in its issue of the 7th March, says that the condition of the rayats in that táluka is growing worse day after day, and that the owners of those fields which produced something have already begun to starve as they have given up all they had to pay the land revenue assessment. A large portion of the rayats are, observes the paper, leaving for other parts in search of food. They have to suffer unnecessary hardship owing to the severity exercised in the collection of the land revenue, which they pay by selling off their cattle at a low price. A very large number of oxen have this year been thus sold for the payment of the land revenue. This is a matter for regret.

Scarcity of drinking water in Gujarát and Káthiáwár.

24. The Gujarát Mitră (79), in its issue of the 3rd March, says that scarcity of drinking water has already begun to be felt in many parts of Gujarát and Káthiáwár owing to scanty rainfall last year, that the people are oppressed with care about the supply of water during the approaching hot months, and that Government and the different municipalities ought to take precautionary measures by digging new wells in suitable localities. The paper also recommends well-to-do people to have wells dug for the benefit of their poor brethren. [The Yajdán Parast (143), in its issue of the 3rd March, says that the threatened water-famine in Gujarát and Káthiáwár will do much harm both to men and cattle, that the latter have already begun to suffer therefrom, and that if endeavours be not made to save them the rayats will have to undergo much hardship in the next rainy season. The Gujaráti (78) of the same date observes that it is necessary that Government should, without loss of time, order the district officers to give due help to the poor people under their charge.]

A social Mogal reformer in Bombay and the order of the Police Commissioner asking him to leave the city.

25. The Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 9th March, says:—Colonel Wilson, Police Commissioner, Bombay, is reported to have asked a certain Mogal reformer named Mirza Nasrulla, who is an able and learned man and has come to Bombay from Iran and who has been for some time past writing and addressing his co-religionists on religious and social topics, to leave Bombay and it is said that the reformer has refused to do so. Certainly the action of the Police Commissioner is unauthorised by law, particularly as the addresses of Mirza Nasrulla are not seditious. Liberty of speech is a public right and does not affect the Mogals alone. The question involved in the requisition of the Police Commissioner is of importance to the public in general, and Government will oblige it by paying attention to it.

The Bombay police and the Government reply to the petition in connection with it.

26. The Kaiser-i-Hind (112), in its issue of the 3rd March, considers the reply given by the Bombay Government to the petition recently presented to them by 5,000 inhabitants of Bombay praying for an increase in the strength and reform of the local police unsatisfactory, and remarks that it is surprising that Government should have stated that they will make further enquiries and then take such steps as may appear advisable, when it is admitted by all that the present police force is inadequate, and that though thefts and highway robberies now appear to have ceased, so much has been said about them during the last few months that all persons hold that Government should take due measures as a safeguard against their repetition in future. [The Yajdán Parast (143) of the same date observes that the reply in question will disappoint the petitioners.]

Complaint against the Broach police.

27. The Anonymous (89) of Broach, in its issue of the 3rd March, complains of many policemen in that town being low men and given to some vice or other, of their indifference in the discharge of their duties and of their failure to trace out big thefts committed in the town, and remarks that it would be better if such worthless men were removed and their places filled by good, and if possible educated, persons, and that old and infirm men like Jamádár Jagusing should be replaced by better men. The paper hopes that the authorities concerned will attend to the matter.

Thefts on the Chálisgaon-Dhulia Road.

28. The Khándesh Chitragupta (40), in its issue of the 3rd March, hears that travellers by the road leading from Dhulia to Chálisgaon are plundered by robbers near the village of Talváde notwithstanding that there is a police chowki, and says that it is a disgrace to the police and that the police authorities should attend to the matter and ensure the safety of person and property of travellers by that road.

PART II.—Legislation.

A suggestion in connection with the Bombay Village Sanitation Bill.

29. The Rást Goftár (83), in its issue of the 3rd March, observes that sufficient time ought to be allowed to the public, and specially the villagers, to think over the Bombay Village Sanitation Bill after it is referred to the Select Committee for report, and that care should be taken in the Bill to save poor villagers from being tyrannized over by Village Sanitary Committees.

PART III.—Education.

Approval of the proposed Arts course of the Bombay University.

30. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 4th March, writes:—The Committee appointed by the Syndicate to revise the Arts course has at last completed its labours and placed its report before the Faculty of Arts. The Committee has, it must be admitted, made excellent use of its opportunities and has produced a report which fully justifies the confidence reposed in it by the Syndicate. The Arts course has by common consent been admitted to have been in urgent need of reform, especially since the famous changes introduced in it under the régime of Sir Richard Temple. The tendency of most of the recent changes is to simplify the examinations and to lower the standard of qualifications for a degree—a tendency greatly to be deplored and which received a deserved rebuke from the Chancellor at the last University Convocation for conferring degrees. This tendency required to be arrested, the standard of the Arts degree to be put on its proper high level, and the deficiencies of culture to be supplied. These objects the Committee has well kept in view and we venture to promise for its report a hearty acceptance from the general public. There may indeed be some ground for variety of opinion on some of the points, but taken as a whole the report is eminently satisfactory. The most noteworthy, as it is the most radical, change proposed, and one which is expected to be most hotly contested, is the extension of the period of the course from three to four years. This is a change which we have long ardently wished for, and which, in our opinion, is by far the best among the many salutary changes proposed by the Committee. The only plausible objection that can be advanced against it is that it increases the hardship of poor students by prolonging their stay at College and putting off their commencement of life for one year longer. But against this it must be remembered that only a very small percentage of the students, not much exceeding ten, do actually finish their course in three years. A change of still greater importance is the introduction of the vernaculars throughout the course and making History, Political Economy, Logic and Natural Science obligatory. The omission of the vernaculars from the University course had long been a matter of dissatisfaction and their recognition in the Committee's scheme is graceful deference to public opinion. The introduction of the vernaculars in addition to a classical language may at first sight look like increasing the work of students, but the arrangement of the papers in the different examinations and the details of the work to be done for each show that no increase is contemplated. All that is proposed to be done is to set a paper in translation and composition in the vernaculars at each one of the examinations. This provision, while it will enforce the attention of the students to the cultivation of the vernaculars, will add little to their actual work. The proposal to make a knowledge of History and Political Economy compulsory also introduces a most desirable reform—a reform the desirability of which few will question. Here too we should ask the University to push the reform further by reverting to the old system of requiring a knowledge of the history of ancient Greece and Rome at the Matriculation. When these histories were prescribed for the Matriculation they were learnt at school, and the early lessons thus imbibed, as well as the information then assimilated, was of the utmost value in understanding English literature.

Part IV.—Municipalities.

An alleged high-handed action of the Collector of Shikárpur with regard to the appointment of secretary to the Shikárpur Municipality.

31. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 2nd March, writes:—Our readers must have learnt from our Shikárpur correspondent that at a general meeting of the Shikárpur Corporation Mr. Atmárám Gangárám Masand, a graduate of the Bombay University, was elected municipal secretary and appointed on probation for two months. But they will be surprised to learn now that the Collector of Shikárpur, who is the president of the municipality, has peremptorily ordered the chairman of the managing committee of the Shikárpur Municipality not to allow Mr. Masand to join the post or do any work and to advertise for a European or Eurasian candidate for the appointment. We like to know under what authority this mandate has been issued. There is no law, so far as we know, which authorises the president of a municipality as such to set aside the action of the general meeting. The president, if he does attend a meeting, has no more power or authority than any other member. He has a second or casting vote only if there is an equal division of votes, but he has no right to treat the resolution of the municipality with contempt or to set its action at naught. We fail to find any provision in the Municipal Act authorising the president in any way to interfere with the action of the municipality. Perhaps it may be said that Colonel Mayhew, the Collector of Shikárpur, in issuing the mandate has acted in his capacity as Collector. We know the Collector has ample powers of interference with the action taken, or contemplated to be taken, by the municipality in the interests of the public, but we have yet to learn that he can set aside the law which gives him such ample powers to veto the nomination by the municipal commissioners of any person they choose to consider best for the post of secretary on the ground that they have fixed their choice on a Hindu graduate. In fact we find that neither the Collector as such nor the Commissioner has any power to refuse to accept any person whom the municipality appoints as its secretary. The discretion of the municipality in the matter of appointments under its control is unlimited and we would like to learn the authority under which the Collector has assumed to himself the function of dictating to it in the manner he has done. Mr. Masand has not been tried at all, because the Collector thinks that he can refuse to allow him to join the post, and so it cannot be said that he has been found to have failed. What objection has the Collector to the nomination of Mr. Masand? We can conceive of no objection unless it be that Colonel Mayhew was not consulted beforehand and that Mr. Masand is not his nominee. On what ground again has the Collector asked the chairman to advertise that none but a European or Eurasian need apply for the post? Is the municipality restricted to the choice of a candidate from one particular class to the exclusion of other classes? The municipality as a body may in its discretion select a particular candidate or select a candidate from a particular class, but what authority has the Collector, whether he be president of the municipality or not, to impose his own conditions on it? We wait for satisfactory answers being given to these questions, and in the event of failure to do so, we shall point to this as one instance of the mischievous interference of a Collector with the municipality and move the Government to take measures against this arbitrary and high-handed act.

Local self-government in Thána and remarks on the conduct of Mr. Keshavlál, the official president of the Thána Municipality, towards his colleagues.

32. The Arunodaya (20), in its issue of the 3rd March, refers to a remark made by Mr. Keshavlál, Huzur Deputy Collector and president of the Thána Municipality, in the course of his evidence in the Assistant Judge's Court at Thána in a case regarding the octroi duty imposed by the Thána Municipality, says that Mr. Keshavlál was very mean and overbearing in making the reflections he made on his colleagues in the municipality, that men like him are quite unfit to discharge the duties of a Magistrate and that they are sure to bring local self-government into discredit, and requests Government to appoint non-official presidents to all municipalities, and particularly to that of Thána, if they want to see how far the people are fit to enjoy the right of local self-government.

Suggestions about municipal nominations at Poona.

33. Writing about the last municipal elections at Poona, the Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 4th March, observes:—One remarkable feature about these elections is that no Mahomedan gentleman offered himself as a candidate for election. In all other respects the elections were satisfactory. We see among the elected members the various leading races and castes, as well as the various interests, duly represented. The officer vested with the power of nomination on behalf of Government will, it is expected, so select the nominees as to supply, firstly, the deficiency so far as the Mahomedan interests are concerned, and, secondly, those of mature official experience and professional skill. We have not the slightest doubt that the nominations which will be shortly announced will be such as will commend themselves to the public generally. [The same paper in its Maráthi columns disapproves of the practice of nominating members on the municipal corporation from high families without looking to their fitness, and recommends Government to nominate on the Poona Municipal Corporation professional experts like Ráo Bahádur Vásudev Bápuji Kánitkar and Drs. Vishrám Rámji and Dáda Nátháji and experienced Government officers like Mr. Plunkett. The paper is also of opinion that Khán Bahádur Dorábji Padamji, who ably discharged the duties of president during the last three years, should be nominated by Government.]

34. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 3rd March, writes:—The municipal elections at Poona on the whole were very successful and the arrangements perfect. Now Government have to nominate ten commissioners to the municipal board. These need not be Government servants. Mr. Crawford introduced the desirable practice of nominating Native gentlemen of independent position in place of Government officials who have to resign owing to transfer to another district. We hope therefore that this excellent practice will be followed by the present Commissioner, C. D. For our part we should like to suggest the names of the following gentlemen from among whom selection may be made: Ráo Bahádur Vishnu M. Bhide, Ráo Bahádur Vásudev Bápuji Kánitkar, Prof. Váman Shivrám A'pte, Ráo Bahádur Hari Rávji Chiplunkar, Ráo Bahádur Náráyan Bhái Dándekar, Nawáb Majid Khán, Khán Bahádur Dorábji Padamji, Dr. Vishrám Rámji Ghole, Dr. Dáda Nátháji, and Ráo Bahádur Náráyan Bhikáji Joglekar. We have also to suggest to Government the desirability of not appointing gentlemen whose only claim is that they belong to a high family or to a particular community. That is a principle which often leads to abuse of patronage. Ráo Bahádur Ráste and Ráo Sáheb G. V. Sánglikar will be found to have been absent from a large number of meetings. Yet the public feel that they are sure to get in as Government nominees as if it were their birthright. We also learn that Ráo Sáheb Narsopant is trying to get himself nominated and to take revenge upon the citizens of Poona for his disgraceful defeat in the ward elections. Others too of his party may make efforts to get in by the back door. But we have confidence in the good sense of our present Collector as also in that of the Commissioner, C. D. [The Kesari (39), in its issue of the 5th March, also says that men like Ráo Bahádur Ráste and Sardár Sánglikar, whose only qualification is that they belong to high families but do not even take the trouble of going to the municipal office, should not be nominated by Government, and that in the opinion of some persons it would have been better if the names of Dr. Chhatre, Mr. Phátak, the new Head Master of the Poona High School, and Ráo Bahádur Nulkar had been suggested by newspapers in the place of Dr. Ghole, Khán Bahádur Dorábji Padamji and other old members.]

Suggestions to Government with regard to the nomination of members to the Ahmednagar Municipal Corporation.

35. The Jagadádarsh (34), in its issue of the 3rd March, refers to the recent municipal ward elections at Ahmednagar, disapproves of the principle observed in them of electing members from among the permanent inhabitants alone without considering their qualifications, and suggests that Government should nominate members who are intelligent, educated, straightforward and have a good command over the English language. Government, the paper adds, need not nominate any representative of the trading classes as they have been more than enough represented on the corporation. [The Nagar Samáchár (45), in its issue of the 2nd March, says that among the six non-official members to be nominated by Government there should be none of those who have failed in their attempts to get themselves elected, and that Government should supply the present deficiency by nominating some able Mahomedan as a representative of that large community.]

A request to the Collector of Dhárwár to look into the matter of the recent municipal elections at Gadag.

36. The Rasik Ranjini (148), in its issue of the 28th February, draws the attention of the Collector of Dhárwár to the manner in which the recent municipal elections at Gadag were held, requests an enquiry into the matter and says:—There are two parties in Gadag and some of the Government servants and the head clerk of the municipality are in favour of one of them. We have heard that Mr. Mártandráo, the polling officer for the third ward, and the head clerk exerted their influence in having Mr. Omachagi, who belongs to their party, elected for that ward. The other candidate for this ward was Ráo Sáheb Rághavendraráo Vakil, who is believed to have secured more votes than his rival, but it is said that the voters' returns in this ward were tampered with in favour of Mr. Omachagi and the head clerk was found to have used unfair means in securing a majority of votes in his favour.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Omission of India from the Queen's recent speech and the explanation given of it in Parliament.

1. The Pársi Punch (123), in its issue of the 10th March, contains a cartoon representing the vivisection of the Indian ox, emblematic of India, by Lord Cross, who being represented as a doctor has a large knife, emblematic of the India Office, in his hand, with which he is vivisecting the animal. The legs of the ox are securely tied with a rope and it is lying in a sorrowful manner on the vivisection table termed Taxation. Two peacocks, emblematic of education, which appear to be dead, are lying near His Lordship's feet. Britannia, with a trident in her hand, stands near one end of the table watching the operation. The letter-press is as follows :—Vivisection ! Dr. Cr—ss.—The throbbing of flesh which you see, Madam, proceeds from the seat of pleasure under intense excitement. In India they call this acme of joy "Brahmánand !" [In answer to a question in the House of Commons as to the absence of any mention about India in the Queen's recent speech, it was explained that perfect happiness and contentment reigned in that country ; hence the silence !] The Bakul (22), in its issue of the same date, says that it is a pity that a palpably erroneous opinion about the real condition of India should prevail in high quarters in England, and considers it absolutely necessary that there should be an able representative of India in Parliament like Mr. Dádábhái Navroji to speak on behalf of its people and to attract the attention of the English public to its woes.

Prospect of reduction in the salt-duty in India hailed with delight.

2. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 6th March, says :—The Indian community will be glad to learn that Lord Cross declared before the House of Lords that the earliest opportunity would be taken to abolish the salt-duty. It was with utmost reluctance that he sanctioned the present increase therein, and India will be grateful to His Lordship if he can find ways and means to abrogate this increased duty on one of the most urgent necessaries of life.

The Indian salt-duty and the Government of India.

3. The Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 13th March, expresses surprise at the news lately published by the Times of India that the Supreme Government have no present intention of reducing the salt-duty, while its pernicious effects upon the poor rayat of India have been plainly admitted by the Secretary of State for India. [The Satyavakta (131), in its issue of the 15th March, expresses similar sentiments, and adds that the Government of India have been playing a nice trick in declaring their helplessness before the Secretary of State for India in affairs concerning this country, and that such a policy is likely to create distrust of Government.]

4. The Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 14th March, says :—It seems from the statement recently made by him in Parliament that Lord Cross is of opinion that the present rate of the salt-duty is oppressive and unjust, and hence the announcement made by the Government of India that it is not their intention to reduce this duty for the present has taken the public by surprise. Some of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's recent administrative acts, and the announcement in connection with the salt-duty is one of them, have raised the fear that Lord Dufferin might be found after all to be a better administrator than the present Viceroy. Another thing is that Lord Lansdowne is stated to have disapproved of Lord Dufferin's suggestions for reform of the Indian Legislative Councils. It is not a little surprising that Lord Lansdowne should not fall in with the views of such a cautious statesman as the Marquis of Ava, and the public would not deserve blame if it inferred that the present administration would not in the end prove beneficial to the country. The replies given by Lord Lansdowne to the different addresses of welcome presented to him did not indicate that His Lordship had such a low opinion of the Indians as his present behaviour towards them shows.

5. The Yajdán Parast (143), in its issue of the 10th March, quotes the conversation the Paris correspondent of the Standard newspaper had with Dhulip Sing regarding the latter's intention to raise a mutiny in India, thinks Dhulip Sing to be crazed in mind, asks whether some selfish and intriguing Europeans are not doing it all in Dhulip Sing's name with a view to harm the movements that are being made to secure more political rights for the Native public of India and thereby to prevent the Home Government from conceding them, and adds that the public will be glad to find this suspicion to be false. [The Gujarát Mitră (79) of the 10th March publishes the proclamation issued in the name of Dhulip Sing, suspects it to be the work of some persons who are opposed to the utilization of the armies of Native States by the British Government, and says that these persons wish to kill two birds with one stone, viz., to create distrust of the Native Princes and so to make Government give up the work of training and utilizing their armies, and to ruin Dhulip Sing. It adds that if this suspicion be groundless, Dhulip Sing must certainly have gone mad, and that it is advisable that such a proclamation, which has not reached India, should be stopped. The Parsi Tikákár (124), in its issue of the 15th March, remarks that the people and the Native Princes of India will have to suffer much on account of the raving of Dhulip Sing, and that the British administration of India will become more strict hereafter. A few other papers set down Dhulip Sing as a mad man and remark that his utterances are futile.]

The attitude of Lord Cross to Lord Dufferin's proposals in the matter of reform of the Indian Legislative Councils and the duty of the people of India.

6. The Kesari (39), in its issue of the 12th March, says:—It is much to be regretted that Lord Cross has not treated Lord Dufferin's proposals about the reform of the Legislative Councils in India with that respect and attention which proposals coming from such a careful and astute administrator as Lord Dufferin deserved. Whatever may be his opinion about the Indian National Congress movement, Lord Dufferin has done to India the service of bringing to the notice of the Secretary of State for India and his Council the aspirations of the people of India, such as on careful and patient enquiry are considered to be reasonable, and for this service India is much indebted to him. It may be that Lord Dufferin's parting utterances may have prejudiced the mind of the Secretary of State in disposing of the question of the reform of the Legislative Councils. The people should not, however, remain idle, but should continue agitating. They can, through the Indian Agency and the National Congress, put this and such other questions before the Parliament of Great Britain. They must ask for a Parliamentary Committee, and leading spirits like Messrs. Telang, Ránade, Tyabji, Mehta, Hume, Norton and others should gird up their loins to give evidence before it. The Indian people must go to the very fountain-head of justice and must not remain satisfied with the assurances of Mr. Gladstone or depend upon the whims of the Secretary of State for India. They need not feel disheartened, but must make all possible efforts to achieve the ends in view,—to acquire the right of representation, and along with it the right of interpellation.

His Excellency Lord Lansdowne and his alleged disinclination to undertake the reform of the Legislative Councils as proposed by the Earl of Dufferin.

7. The Sudhárak (17), in its issue of the 11th March, says:—Ever since Lord Dufferin delivered his famous Jubilee speech, so full of sympathy with Native aspirations, people have been repeatedly led to expect some substantial reform in the constitution of the Legislative Councils in the near future. It was for a long time supposed that His Lordship had submitted an important scheme for the reform of these Councils to the Secretary of State for India, and though the exact nature of the proposals was not definitely known, they were commonly believed to be sufficiently liberal to satisfy all moderate expectations. His Excellency Lord Lansdowne has, we are told, practically set his face against all the valuable features of his predecessor's scheme, he is said to be "extremely disinclined to make concessions" on the question of the introduction of the elective principle, he does not view with favour the idea of granting the right of interpellation, and lastly he is "reluctant to agree to the proposal to submit the budget to discussion by the Provincial Councils," so that with the possible exception of raising the number of members to thirty Lord Lansdowne regards the proposals of his immediate predecessor in office as either premature or dangerous. We do not know whether timidity or want of sympathy with the aspirations of the people counsels this attitude on the part of our Viceroy, but we shall say this—that if he really means to strip his predecessor's scheme of these three features and if he wants to give us, under the name of reformed

Legislative Councils, bodies constituted in the same unsatisfactory way in which they now are,—only larger, he should spare himself the trouble, and spare also this insult to the intelligence of the educated classes of supposing that they would be satisfied with any such sham. If we are not to have the right of interpellation and if we are not to be allowed to criticize the budget, we might very well leave the present constitution of these Councils undisturbed. And when we are told that the elective principle cannot be introduced, because it is very difficult to create a proper electorate, (from the ranks of educated men, of course,) we are tempted to cry "Fie on His Lordship's statesmanship!" What fills us with the greatest anxiety is not merely the fate of Lord Dufferin's proposals, for sooner or later, by a Liberal Government if not by a Conservative one, a measure as liberal as this will be conceded to us. It is the influence which the Anglo-Indian bureaucracy appears to have gained over our new Viceroy, and of which his attitude towards Lord Dufferin's proposals is, we are afraid, only an unfortunate manifestation, that creates in us very grave apprehensions as to the way in which Lord Lansdowne will deal with the various problems that will present themselves to him during his Viceroyalty. A very sympathetic ruler he does not, we are sorry to say, promise to be, and we must see that public opinion, declared with frankness and emphasis, prevents him from acting on advices prejudicial to the best interests of the country and the ultimate welfare of the Indian people. [The Satyavakta (131), in its issue of the 15th March, expresses regret at the alleged reluctance of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne to reform the Legislative Councils as proposed by the Earl of Dufferin, his predecessor in office, and remarks that it appears that the expectations formed of His Lordship by the public are likely to remain unfulfilled.]

8. The Rást Goftár (83), in its issue of the 10th March, says:—Whatever the proposals of Lord Dufferin in the matter of the Legislative Councils may be, we are pretty sure of two facts: firstly, of the far from benevolent attitude of the majority of the advisers of the Viceroy and of the Secretary of State for India in Council; and, secondly, of the extreme timidity personally of Lord Cross to enter into this large question on his own responsibility. We are firmly of opinion that it will be a solemn farce to adhere to the principle of nomination in the constitution of these councils. For the rudimentary effective principle to be carried into effect there exists at present a workable machinery in the municipal corporations, in the different chambers of commerce, and in the universities. All these bodies are highly intelligent and enlightened and would serve well for some years to come as the groundwork of an electorate for electing at least half the number of members of the Supreme Legislative Council. While in the local boards and district municipalities as well as in the local universities each province will find ready at hand all the materials of an electorate that will return members to the provincial councils. But our chief contention is that unless the Supreme Legislative Council itself is expanded and its elected members are given the power to discuss the Imperial budget unreservedly and to interpellate the Government on all questions, including those of military expenditure, which is the root, we repeat, of all the financial embarrassments of the Indian Government, the public will not be satisfied. By all means let the executive have the right of veto. But it is essential for the true and permanent welfare of India that her chosen representatives, Europeans and Natives, should have the power to freely discuss the annual budget. It is only when the fierce light of enlightened non-official criticism is brought to bear upon the finances of the Empire that they can be put on a healthy footing and administered for the permanent interests of the people. India wants financial rest instead of an annual accretion of debts and enhanced taxation. Moreover, she requires to build up a strong reserve. There is no such reserve and none will ever be formed if the reckless foreign policy, which now yearly squanders away millions of the hard-earned money of the impoverished agriculturists, is allowed to hold its sway in the councils of the Empire. It can only be curbed by the responsible non-official representatives of the people in the supreme council. And as to interpellation, the right must be fully granted. Reservation may be made on public matters on which the interests of the Empire really require reticence. But it will not do if, when the executive is interpellated, it should take refuge in the hollow plea that "it would be prejudicial to the country's interests" to state this, that and the other thing. The greater the publicity that is given to Government acts and intentions, so far as those acts and intentions do require explanation, the greater will be the confidence in the Government and the greater its strength in proportion. But we repeat that it is not worth while to reform provincial councils if there is to be no reform at the fountain-head, where is moulded the administrative and financial policy which really governs the Empire. It would be a farce to have Hamlet left out of the solemn play of Government. And if such a farce be in contemplation, then all that we could say is that it had better not be enacted. The country should vigorously agitate for the reform of the Supreme Legislative Council as the preliminary to all other reforms. That should be the goal at which leaders of Native thought should aim. In fact, they ought never to rest till it is conceded. Bearing in mind that there are in the Conservative cabinet some ministers, including the Premier, who are for a genuine though cautious reform,—ministers who think that in this matter the reform should begin at the top and not at the bottom,—we cannot too strongly urge upon the leading and representative public associations in all parts of the Empire the necessity for vigorously agitating on the lines we have sketched. Let their warcry be "Reform of the Supreme Legislative Council."

9. In noticing the telegram received by the Bombay Gazette from England to the effect that Lords Salisbury, Cross and Lansdowne are all opposed to the proposal made by Lord Dufferin for the admission of popular representation in the Indian Legislative Councils, the Bodh Sudhákar (6), in its issue of the 13th March, says:—At an interview that the Honourable Mr. Badrudin Tyabji had with His Excellency Lord Lansdowne when he landed at Bombay on his way to Calcutta, His Lordship observed that he would exert for the due consideration by Parliament of the several resolutions passed by the Indian National Congress in connection with the Legislative Councils of the country, and hence it seems strange that His Lordship should have diverged from this assurance that had created great hopes in the Indian public about His Lordship's administration proving highly beneficial to the country. But since the telegram is quite explicit, it seems that there is some change in the opinion expressed by His Lordship on the occasion mentioned above. However the British rulers ought to bear in mind the advice given them by Edward Burke, that the principles of English constitution should be adopted in the administration of British dependencies. It is injustice to the natives of India to say that they are not as yet worthy of being admitted into the Legislative Councils, and the Government ought to entertain no fear whatever from admitting popular representatives into those councils.

Appointment of an Assistant Military Secretary for Indian affairs to the Commander-in-Chief in England and remarks in connection therewith.

10. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 10th March, says:—A small but very important item of news comes from Allahabad—that Sir W. Lockhart has been appointed Assistant Military Secretary for Indian Affairs to the Commander-in-Chief in England. The cost, we presume, will be met from Indian funds. A number of questions are suggested by this announcement—What is the meaning of it? Does it not mean that the foreign military policy of India will be dictated by the Commander-in-Chief and the Secretary of State for War in England, as the political phase of that policy is decided by her Foreign Office? Is the old costly fourfold military establishment of India then wanted any longer—the Commander-in-Chief in India and the Presidential Commanders-in-Chief with all their subsidiary departments and offices? But these and other similar points which might suggest themselves are only of minor interest. The question of first importance is, where is a line to be drawn between Indian and English imperial interests, and is India in the future to be made to pay for the latter, as she has been made to do in the past, whenever her name could be directly or indirectly, physically or politically, connected with any measure of English policy, whether it be just or unjust, to saddle her with the cost, and whether she is able to bear it or no? The Government and the people of India must raise the question and claim half a share of our imperial charges from England, as the only practical solution of it. Every year of delay adds to the embarrassment of the Government and the difficulties of the administration; and, therefore, no more time, it seems to us, should be lost, if we are to get rid of these difficulties and embarrassments.

11. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 14th March, says:—The India Council, composed as it is of men antiquated and out of touch with the circumstances of India, is unfit to consider the recommendations of the Public Service Commission and the observations of the Governor-General of India thereon, and there would be nothing surprising if its final conclusions disappointed the Native public. India has many a time protested in newspapers and in memorials by public associations against the present constitution of, and the manner of members appointed to, the India Council, but Government have hitherto paid no attention to them and all blame in the matter attaches to them. It is not, however, all men who will be disappointed with the way in which the India Council is expected to dispose of the report of the Public Service Commission; for there are many persons who by their past experience of the policy of the British Government have learnt not to be very sanguine about it. They do not entertain strong hopes of receiving benefits from it and therefore they cannot suffer disappointment. Government have been distrustful of the loyalty of the Natives, and that is mainly because they are conscious of their own conduct towards their subjects. They make large promises in times of emergency, but never redeem them, and naturally they suspect that like their own hollow promises the loyalty professed by the subject-people must also be hollow and lip-loyalty. But in this they are mistaken. The natives of India are by their very nature loyal, and being educated to boot, they cannot turn out disloyal, and we request that Government will harbour no suspicion about their allegiance.

Political movements of the natives of India and the circular said to have been issued by the Government of India in connection therewith.

12. The Káthiáwádi (81), in its issue of the 12th March, refers to the circular said to have been issued by the Government of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne in order to ascertain whether Government servants take part in any political movement and to find out their names, and thinks that it would serve to promote the cause of the Indian National Congress if it were meant to stop Government officers such as Sir Auckland Colvin from obstructing it, as supposed by some of its contemporaries. The paper thinks that Government have acted with a good motive in this matter as shown by the reply recently given by Sir John Gorst, Under Secretary of State for India, to a question asked by a member of the Liberal party, viz., that it would be erroneous to suppose that Government wish to obstruct the political progress of the natives of India. It adds that it is sufficient that such illustrious personages as Mr. Gladstone, Lord Ripon, and Lord Reay are favourably inclined towards the political movements of the people of India, and prays God that the new Viceroy may also be similarly disposed.

Government servants and the Indian National Congress.

13. The Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 14th March, says:—The Commissioner of Assam has issued a circular forbidding all Government servants from joining any political body. A similar circular was issued by the Marquis of Dufferin before his departure and the people are of opinion that it must have been circulated all round. It is a stain on the reputation of the Government, which professes to be liberal in its principles, that it should treat its Native servants as if they had sold their bodily and other independence to it for the pay they received. We do not say that they should neglect the work of Government and attend to political movements. It would be oppression on the part of Government if it were to prevent them from devoting their private time to political movements or from wishing good of the Indian National Congress, and would show the inability of Government to know how far such a circular was practicable.

Sir Auckland Colvin and the Indian National Congress movement.

14. The Satyavakta (131), in its issue of the 15th March, observes that it is said that Sir Auckland Colvin, Lieutenant-Governor, North-West Provinces, has sent a list of the delegates present at the last Indian National Congress meeting at Allahabad from the North-West Provinces to the Divisional Commissioners, asking them to furnish him with information regarding the status and representative character of the delegates and the amount of money subscribed for the Congress Fund in their divisions. The people might, remarks the paper, be frightened by such a minute enquiry, but not the advocates of the Congress. If such be the result of the enquiry, the well-wishers of the movement ought to take measures to counteract it. Sir Auckland Colvin will certainly fail if he thereby attempts to show that the Congress is seditious and that the delegates to it are not representative men and are not well-known. At any rate it is desirable that the enquiry should be very minute and that the advocates of the Congress should take prompt and effectual measures to stop its injurious effect.

The Indian National Congress meeting held at Allahabad denounced.

15. The Kárwár Samáchár (37), in its issue of the 7th March, observes:—Among the Europeans who attended the fourth meeting of the Indian National Congress at Allahabad were Mr. Hume who is well-known in connection with Madame Blavatsky of the Mahátmá notoriety, Mr. Norton who is an atheist like Mr. Bradlaugh, M. P., and Captain Hearsay who was imprisoned for a month for having assaulted the editor of the Pioneer. Certainly, such personages as these cannot be considered to reflect much credit on the Congress. Mr. Yule was appointed president of the last meeting at Allahabad, proving thereby that not one of the Natives who had assembled in large numbers was fit to occupy that position! The meeting was nothing more than child's play. Mr. Caine, M. P., was present at the Congress meetings and was much pleased with them. He was evidently taken in by the outward show made by the Congressionists, who, as a rule, do not follow the professions they make in public.

Contemplated enactment of an Act for lepers in India by the Supreme Government approved.

16. The Gujaráti (78), in its issue of the 10th March, praises the Government of India for their intention of framing an Act for the segregation and maintenance of lepers who go about the public streets begging for alms, and remarks that Government will thereby earn the blessings of the poor lepers and at the same time lay the general public under obligation by freeing it from apprehension of contagion. [Several other papers express delight at the rumoured intention of the Supreme Government to frame an Act in the matter.]

Treatment of Native prisoners of good position while in jail and a request to Her Excellency Lady Lansdowne to devote herself to the reform of Indian jails.

17. The Satyavakta (131), in its issue of the 15th March, refers to the complaint made in the Madras and Bengal newspapers about the low and unsuitable diet being the cause of the death in the Trichinopoly jail of Kunjen Menon, late Judge of Tellicherry, complains of the prisoners of different religions having no facilities to escape pollution while in jail, and says that Native prisoners, who may have been in good position in society before their incarceration, should have a better kind of food given to them than the ordinary jail diet given to low prisoners, inasmuch as European and Eurasian prisoners do get a richer diet than that given to Native convicts and as Government also have all along admitted the necessity for keeping the various prisoners according to their status. [The Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 12th March, points out the necessity for the better feeding and treatment of Native prisoners and specially of those of good position in society, says that the high rate of mortality in Indian jails is generally attributable to the low jail diet, supports the suggestion that Her Excellency Lady Lansdowne should devote herself to the reform of Indian jails and of the condition of the prisoners confined therein, considers the work to be well befitting her high position, and remarks that if Her Ladyship succeeds in the matter even to a small extent she will achieve more glory than the Countess of Dufferin has done by her efforts in the cause of supplying female medical aid to the women of India. It adds that it is necessary that such tender but influential hands as Her Ladyship's should now devote themselves to the work, as the measures hitherto taken in this direction have almost failed.]

Disapproval of the enforcement of the provisions of Section 143 of the Civil Leave Code.

18. A correspondent of the Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 9th March says:—Government in their resolution in the Financial Department have decided that the provisions of Section 143 of the Civil Leave Code, which require that "an applicant for leave must not appear before the Chief Medical Officer of the station or district or Presidency Surgeon without the cognizance of the head of his office, or, if he is himself the head of his office, of the head of his department" should be enforced.

Now the question that naturally suggests itself to one's mind is why this ruling should be made applicable in the case of those who are incapacitated for work owing to illness for some period and who do not intend to retire from the service. As it is, no Government servant, however ill he may be, can get a medical certificate without obtaining a letter from his superior officer. It not unfrequently occurs that some of these persons, who not being in the good graces of their superiors are unable to obtain an introductory letter, have to work at the risk of their health, and perhaps of their lives, without any remedy, because it is not possible for them either to displease their superiors by appealing to the higher authorities or by leaving the service, for the sake of obtaining the leave required by them. The rule may very well be enforced with respect to persons who want to retire from the service, but in my opinion it should be relaxed in the case of persons applying for a medical certificate for purposes of short leave. Surely the Civil Surgeons or Chief Medical Officers in charge of stations can be trusted to perform their duties honestly and conscientiously.

Remarks on the financial statement of the Bombay Presidency published in the Bombay Government Gazette of the 28th February 1889.

19. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 11th March, says:—The financial statement for the Bombay Presidency published in the Government Gazette is a very unsatisfactory document. It purports to be a budget, but contains no forecast for the year to come. It deals with the actuals of 1887-88, the budget estimate for 1888-89 and the revised estimate for 1888-89, but has nothing to say about, what is usually the most interesting portion of a budget statement, the proposed ways and means for the following year, i. e., the budget estimate for 1889-90. Further, in the particulars it gives it is extremely meagre and defective. It does not give any idea as to the whole amount paid by the tax-payers of this presidency, nor as to the whole amount spent in this presidency. The statement confines itself to the provincial items of revenue and expenditure and gives a sort of running commentary on the increases and decreases in the several items, but on the whole as one rises from the reading of the statement one has a feeling of disappointment at the paucity of information supplied. It if were an official summary of accounts for the information of the Government of India alone, the statement might suffice as they can supplement it with particulars in their own possession. But for the general public the statement is all but a blank. In publishing such a statement the needs of the public ought not, we think, to be despised, and if it is to be of any use to it ought, we think, to be so framed as to give an idea of the whole financial position of the presidency. The public does not care for any distinctions between imperial and provincial, which are distinctions made by the Financial Department for convenience of account. All it wants to know is how much has been taken from it in a given year and how it is applied. For this purpose the total amounts of revenue and expenditure, imperial and provincial, must be mentioned. Even municipal taxation and expenditure is in the popular mind associated with Government administration. Municipal accounts are, however, altogether outside Government accounts and perhaps it would lead to confusion if they were included. But surely there can be little objection to the imperial items of revenue and expenditure relating to this presidency being mentioned along with the provincial items.

The Mámlatdárs and others who are under suspension from their offices in connection with the Crawford case should get early redress.

20. The Belgaum Samáchár (23), in its issue of the 11th March, says:—Some of the Mámlatdárs and others who did not make a statement in connection with the Crawford case, admitting their own criminality, have been suspended from their offices for some time past, but no redress has been granted to them as yet. It is said that Mr. Rájárao Pilerao, a Faujdár in the Dhárwár district police, who was under suspension for a long time, has been dismissed from office, but it is not known whether by Mr. Ommanney or by Government. If the dismissal has been ordered by Government, it furnishes cause for inference as to the treatment likely to be received by the persons who are in the situation in which the dismissed Faujdár was. Ráo Bahádur Purandhare, District Deputy Collector, Dhárwár, has also been under suspension, and nothing is known as to the decision arrived at in his case. Now that the report of the Crawford Commission has been sent to England it seems proper that a final decision should be arrived at at once in the case of the persons under suspension.

The Bráhmans and the British Government.

21. Under the heading of "Open enmity with the Bráhmans," the Poona Vaibhav (49), in its issue of the 10th March, writes:—It is well-known that there are four castes or classes among the Hindus. The British rulers of India consider it necessary in the interests of their administration of the country to create as much misunderstanding between them as possible. It is a well-known historical truth that it was by this policy that the British people overthrew the Hindu rule in India. They tore asunder the ties of friendship which subsisted between the Scindia, the Holkar, the Gáikwád and other subsidiary princes on one hand and the Peshwa on the other and among the former themselves, concluded separate treaties with them, and thereby made the Peshwa supportless and weak and reinstated themselves in his position. This policy of weakening the enemy was indeed very serviceable to the British in the early days of their Indian rule, but now that there is tranquillity throughout the country and after the lapse of centuries since they got dominion here, it is very surprising that they should stick to it; for, we no longer look upon them as strangers, but identify our interests with their own. If in spite of this fact they treat us as strangers and set one class against another, evidently they have not got rid of the idea of their being strangers from their minds and do not feel themselves firmly settled in this country. They are thinking of securing their objects by creating and encouraging caste jealousies, but we are satisfied that sensible men will not be deceived by these tactics, but will shape their conduct with these manœuvres of theirs fully in view. These things have occurred to us on account of the Collector of Sholápur. Hitherto we have very seldom come across instances of Europeans showing contempt for Bráhmans, but the Collector of Sholápur has lately supplied an instance of the kind by returning a Bráhman applicant's application for a place, saying that according to the rules non-Bráhmans were to be given places. Mr. Candy is at present Collector of Sholápur, and since he, who is not an ignorant European but is a good-natured gentleman, has made such an endorsement in returning an application, certainly Government must have made the rule he speaks of. Moreover, this endorsement is not verbal, but is in writing, registered and numbered, and cannot be unimportant like Mr. Moore's pencil remark "I don't care for Bráhmans." Supposing it for a moment that Government have made a rule like that, how is it that we have neither read nor heard of it? The only secret of entertaining certain classes in the Government service and of excluding certain others from it is to create disunion among the people and thereby to secure the accomplishment of the interests of the rulers. It goes without saying that if Government decline to employ the Bráhmans there are other classes of Hindus who will willingly accept service under them. But who can say that these latter classes will not be similarly treated and will be safe after some time? The Bráhmans are got rid of to-day and to-morrow another class or caste will indisputably meet with the same fate. People belonging to other than the Bráhman class should not, therefore, rejoice at the misfortune of the Bráhmans, but should rest assured that sooner or later it will be their turn to suffer from the same misfortune. If there be any spirit among the Bráhman community, the Bráhman servants in all the provinces should, for this exhibition of partiality on the part of the Collector, resign the service at once or should at any rate take leave for some time. It is indeed hard to resign the service, but it is not very hard, to be sure, to do so voluntarily for the sake of the prestige of the country and with a view to edify the split-creating Europeans, when regard is had to the fact that resignation will be necessary in the event of Government themselves being so desirous. The only thing is that all the Bráhmans must think so. We have respectfully to suggest to Government that they should never be so inconsiderate as to do such a thing. It is sufficient if Government business is done, no matter by whom. It does not at all befit the Englishmen, who style themselves emperors, to prefer the Parbhus over the Bráhmans or the Goldsmiths over the Parbhus. All the classes are the subjects of Government, and it is necessary for a good Government to see to the maintenance of any given caste before excluding it from its service. The Bráhmans cannot conveniently go to a foreign country and must manage to live in India. Not only have Government hitherto protected them in a good manner, but even they have been serviceable to Government, as will be clearly seen. If, however, in forgetfulness of all this, Government do commit an act of injustice like the one above mentioned, no one will consider it wise of them to do it. We also tell Government evidently in their own interests that among the Hindus some classes like that of the Bráhmans do only intellectual work, while some others are even now possessed of heroism and other good qualities. Though Government are thoroughly convinced that the Bráhmans or people of other castes are at the present moment unable to do anything, yet they should well bear in mind that it will never be desirable to prick the Bráhmans or other classes doing merely intellectual work into a life of idleness. It has been a rule from time immemorable that cows and Bráhmans must be protected. In short, no wise ruler should annoy or tease intelligent people of any caste or useful animals like the cow. The Government have already been sacrificing the cows, and if while the hearts of all the Hindus are being thereby scorched Government openly persecute a class like that of the Bráhmans, our country will never relish it. The Mahomedans have ruled over us for a thousand years, but every reader of history is well aware of the condition of their empire as soon as troublesome Emperors like Aurungzebe came to the throne. Every ruler must bear in mind that Aurungzebe persecuted the Bráhmans and the cows, while Shiváji protected them. Otherwise we Hindus are so meek and grateful that we pay divine respect to even Mahomedan Emperors like Akbar. We therefore tell Government for their own sake that they should not do evidently foolish acts like the one which Mr. Candy has done, for undoubtedly they are prejudicial to the interests of the British people.

Disapproval of economy effected in the office of the Meteorological Reporter for Western India by the removal of Mr. Chambers therefrom.

22. The Rást Goftár (83), in its issue of the 10th March, says:—The Bombay Gazette has some caustic remarks to make on the correspondence which has passed between the Bombay Port Trustees and the Officiating Meteorological Reporter to the Government of India. The Port Trust has been asked to subscribe towards the supply, from the Meteorological Office of Western India, of a daily weather report and chart, containing observations from a larger number of stations than have been hitherto reported on this side of the country. The Trustees refuse to pay anything until the Supreme Government should revoke their order by which the meteorological service in these parts has been degraded on grounds of economy. Under the new scheme a telegraph officer is appointed at the head of the Meteorological Office, and he is to devote to his new work as much time as he can spare from his proper duties. The telegraph officer may, for aught we know, be a very estimable gentleman. But he supplants a man of Mr. Chambers's special scientific knowledge and local experience, in a post of the greatest responsibility, deeply affecting large mercantile and shipping interests. The new incumbent, who will only be a half-time or a quarter-time man, is, in racing parlance, a dark horse, at the best. The public knows nothing of his capabilities. But granting that he may attain the acquired degree of efficiency by experience, this is not the office in which a novice, however promising he may be, can be placed, with any regard to human lives, to learn his business. And, after all, what does the Government gain by removing Mr. Chambers, a man of proved merit and ability in regard to his own special work? They make a paltry saving of Rs. 450 per mensem, and they make it at what may prove a lamentably heavy cost. The sad lesson taught by the "Vaiturna" catastrophe appears to have been lost upon our rulers, who need, perhaps, another similar warning to awaken them to the mistake in which they have been persevering with a blind persistence. In their supreme wisdom the Supreme Government have elected to seriously impair the efficiency of the meteorological service, while the Bombay Government have repeatedly asked for increased resources for the office. It may be all smooth sailing under the new arrangement, so long as the weather indicates, in the words of the vigorous protest made by the Port Trustees, "no meteorological disturbances of a nature so peculiar as to draw upon the highest intelligence of an expert and the absence of which may lull the Government into the opinion that the feeble arrangements they propose meet the requirements of the case" The inefficient working of the department may become painfully apparent in times of uncertain and stormy weather.

Modification of the remarks made in a previous issue of the Indian Spectator on the Bombay Secretariat appointments.

23. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 10th March, says:—With regard to the higher Secretariat appointments, it appears that the principle on which they are made has been somewhat misunderstood by us. The facts seem to be these, so far as an outsider could ascertain. Mr. Nugent was appointed Revenue Secretary many years ago, and if he remains Revenue Secretary still it is neither his fault nor of the Government. A better place has to be found for him if he is to be transferred, and such place could be found only in the Bombay Council or in the Council of the Governor-General. Mr. Nugent would not look upon a Commissionership as promotion. Such being the exigencies of the service, it would be scarcely fair to find fault with the Government, especially with the present Government, who found Mr. Nugent in the Secretariat and have had to keep him there for obvious reasons; we could only regret the watandár system. While on the subject, it might be as well to mention here that the Chief Secretary to Government has never been so closely identified with their ábkári policy as is generally believed. We understand that Mr. Nugent has at least an open mind as regards several items of the ábkári administration in Bombay. As to Mr. Pritchard, we find his appointment to the Council was inevitable. He could not possibly have been overlooked, even if there was the inclination to do so, which of course was not the case. Our Native contemporaries need not be frightened, nor need they frighten their readers with a harrowing picture of what is in store for them. As we observed last week, Mr. Pritchard, the Councillor, may perhaps be able to undo the harm done to popular interests by Mr. Pritchard, the A'bkári Commissioner. We believe his faith in the farming system has already given way, and that being so, we may expect a material change for the better in the ábkári policy of Bombay. But ábkári is only one of the numerous questions with which Mr. Pritchard will have to deal, the most important being that of finance. In this connection his robust common sense and firmness of purpose may stand us in good stead in doing battle with the Government of India. Regarding the practice of appointing officers of the Revenue Department to the post of Judicial Secretary, we see the position to be this: The number of posts in the revenue line is larger than that in the judicial, and the District Judges have the High Court to look up to, while District Collectors, we are told, have no such opening—though we believe the Divisional Commissionerships are all their own. Anyhow, it is feared that the Revenue-wállás would make a grievance of it if the Judicial Secretaryship were to be given invariably to a judicial officer. The judicial member of Council has able assistants in some of the Under Secretaries, while the work is not so heavy, nor, we understand, so varied as on the revenue side of the administration. Besides, the Judicial Secretary has political and educational work also to attend to, so that practical judicial experience is not in itself a sine qua non. Mr. Lee-Warner had political experience in his favour, as Agent at Kolhápur, and also educational experience as Director of Public Instruction, not to mention his work in the Foreign Office of the Government of India. And it will not be denied that on the whole he had made excellent use of his opportunities. We may expect the same of Mr. Monteath, who has been in the Secretariat, and who, as Private Secretary to His Excellency the Governor again, has had full insight into the working of almost all branches of the Secretariat, including the political branch. With his abilities, judgment and power of work, we have also the advantage in Mr. Monteath of that continuity which is essential, we believe, under one administration. After all this has been said, however, about Messrs. Monteath, Pritchard and Nugent, and about the principle of appointment which has become necessary, we cannot help once more expressing our regret at such necessity. The judicial branch of the service ought always to be kept in countenance with the public. It is generally felt that somehow or other this is not done.

Bái Motlánbái Jehángirji Wádia recommended for a title.

24. The Pársi Tikákár (124), in its issue of the 15th March, refers to the visit recently paid by Their Excellencies Lord and Lady Reay to Bái Motlánbái Jehángirji Wádia at her residence, who has recently given away about five lákhs of rupees for the construction of an obstetric hospital in Bombay in connection with the Sir Jamsetji Jijibhái Hospital, terms this action on the part of His Excellency Lord Reay to be far-sighted and wise, recommends the rich and well-known Pársi widow for a title, and hopes that the silent good work done by this old and honourable Wádia family will be duly recognised by Government.

Distress and scarcity of drinking-water in some portions of the Broach District.

25. The Anonymous (89) of Broach, in its issue of the 10th March, says that starvation has already begun in a large portion of the Broach District, that scarcity of drinking-water is experienced in some of the villages, that men and cattle are dying, and that some of the villages will in all likelihood become desolate in a short time. It regrets that severity should be exercised at such a time by some officers in the collection of the Government dues, and requests Government to give due help to the people.

The Military Orphanage, Bombay, and Government support.

26. The Kaiser-i-Hind (112), in its issue of the 10th March, refers to the recent public exhibition of the Military Orphanage managed by the Bombay Benevolent Society, advocates the cause of that institution, pleads for increased public support to it, hopes that His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, Bombay, will comply with the request of the managing committee for the formation of small committees in all Native regiments with a view to send the orphans in them to the Orphanage, and adds that it is necessary that Government should also give due help to this useful institution.

The fine inflicted by the Chief Presidency Magistrate, Bombay, upon some mariners for being drunk and disorderly in the town considered inadequate.

27. The Gujaráti (78), in its issue of the 10th March, says:—If the criminal classes in Bombay were to be treated as leniently as the Chief Presidency Magistrate treated four European desperate fellows quite recently, Bombay would be quite unfit for its peace-loving and innocent inhabitants. Some mariners got drunk in the Native town and then returned to the Fort, where they drank more liquor at some of the bars in Marine Street. For nearly half an hour the drunken fellows were in possession of the Fort, breaking and smashing everything that came in their way, threatening and bullying poor women, annoying and knocking down ghárrywállás and defying the police for some time. For all these innocent tricks the Chief Presidency Magistrate inflicted a fine of ten rupees upon each offender! Will this punishment produce the slightest deterrent effect upon the riotous, disorderly and drunken set of fellows who now and then strike terror and create panic in streets and public roads? We think the sentence is quite inadequate and is in striking contrast with that recently passed upon some Pársi school-boys, whose offence compared with that of these rioters was almost nothing. In the interests of public security we think that the High Court ought to interfere and enhance the sentence in such cases.

Contracts of ferry-boats in Kánara and Mr. Ingle, Huzur Deputy Collector.

28. The Havyak Subodh (146), in its issue of the 12th March, suggests to Government the appointment of a commission of enquiry into the contracts of ferry-boats at the village of Divige, and says:—We have heard that the Huzur Deputy Collector of Kánara has admitted that through his clerk's oversight the contracts were given at one and the same rate. We have also heard from a reliable source that the contracts of four or five other boats have been given unlawfully. Let us see whether the Deputy Collector gives similar explanation for them too. It is rumoured that Mr. Ingle has been transferred to another district, and if so, Government have a fine opportunity of looking into all his affairs. People will now fearlessly come forth to give out the secrets.

Petitions presented to the Collector of Poona.

29. The Jagad-hitechchhu (13), in its issue of the 9th March, states that petitions are received by the Collector of Poona on two or three days in the week and not daily, and that thereby much inconvenience is caused to the petitioners who come from outstations, and expresses a hope that measures will be taken to remove their inconvenience.

Praise of Colonel Humfrey, the special Barwatiah officer, and approval of his rumoured appointment as Inspector-General of Police in Káthiáwár.

30. The Káthiáwár Times (82), in its issue of the 13th March, says:—We understand from a very reliable source that Government are about to appoint Colonel Humfrey, the special Barwatiah officer, as Inspector-General of Police, Káthiáwár. The Chiefs of Káthiáwár will heartily endorse our opinion when we say that no better officer could have been selected for the post than Colonel Humfrey whose eminent services to the province so deservedly require recognition. Colonel Humfrey has had very varied experience and his whole heart is in his work. His high detective qualities and tact in dealing with Barwatiahs eminently qualify him for the post. Almost all the States, for the safety of their subjects, will express their readiness and willingness to place their police at the disposal of Colonel Humfrey. They cannot fail to recognise the necessity for such a procedure after the efficient re-organization of the Junágad and the Gondal police. Jámnagar being a very important State, Colonel Humfrey shall first direct his efforts to the police re-organization of that State, where, it is needless to add, he will receive every assistance from the enlightened administrators. Colonel Humfrey has twice received the thanks of Government for his valuable services in Káthiáwár, and may he be long spared to serve in a province the welfare of which he has so much at heart!

Suggestions for the reformation of the police.

31. The Shubh Suchak (82), in its issue of the 8th March, says:—The Government of India are said to be thinking of effecting an improvement in the Police Department, and the following suggestions for the amelioration of the police force would not be inappropriate. Of late persons of low character are generally enlisted in the police, and this has given rise to many complaints on the part of the people, who attribute diverse shortcomings of the police to this state of things. Acting arrogantly towards the people, neglecting to trace crime, taking no care for the prevention of offences, and failing to exercise sufficient control over the criminal classes,—these are the defects of the police, who have thereby lost the confidence of the public. This unsatisfactory state of things needs an urgent cure, which can be effected by appointing educated Natives to the posts of head and chief constables and inspectors, by making promotion dependent solely on detection of crime, and reduction of salary and rank as a necessary consequence of failure to do so, by making the police service accessible to all classes without distinction of caste or creed, by appointing to the posts of Assistant Police Superintendents those only who have achieved distinction in the police service, and by requiring the Superintendent of Police to possess a good knowledge of the vernaculars of the country, to move constantly in his district, to exercise strict supervision over the work performed by his subordinates, and to see that the village authorities exercise a proper watch on the movements of the criminal classes.

Proposal made by the Commissioner of Police, Bombay, to add six European officers to the local police force.

32. The Jáme Jamshed (109), in its issue of the 15th March, disapproves of the proposal said to have been made by the Commissioner of Police, Bombay, to Government to add six European officers to the present police force, hesitates to believe that greater safety and public peace will be secured thereby, and says that it is necessary that the number of Native policemen should be first increased with a view to meet the increased requirements of the city, that the Native police force should be made more attractive than at present by good salaries and promotions, and that it can well be improved within the amount of expenditure required for six new European officers.

Alarm about insecurity in Bombay and the alleged inefficiency of the local police.

33. The Vártáhar (19), in its issue of the 10th March, says that people in Bombay are nowadays afraid to move about in the town late at night on account of the serious assaults that are frequently committed by bad characters, and that the police order warning the people against the danger of sleeping in the verandahs of their houses and the fact of the recent Kumbhárwáda murders so long remaining untraced are the signs of the inefficiency of the police, and requests the Police Commissioner to allay the anxiety of the people in consequence.

Increase of crime in Sátára and suggestions to the Collector in regard to it.

34. In an article headed "Mogal rule has commenced in Sátára," the Pratod (52), in its issue of the 11th March, says:—On account of the slackness of the law, crime has been rife in Sátára as everywhere else. There is, as it were, an epidemic of thefts, incendiarism, cattle-killing and forgery. Cases of assault have also become the order of the day. On account of laxity in the penal law and in the law of evidence, real offenders often escape scot-free and the law has lost its terror. On account of the practice of registering documents having come into vogue under the Agriculturists' Relief Act, the fabrication and forging of documents have become very easy matters. That Act which was intended for the benefit of the agriculturists has on the contrary become dangerous to them. By the system of registration, registrars have had a jolly time of it. We do not know what to say if the hedge, which is planted for the protection of sugarcane, itself eats it. On the whole the present state of things in the Sátára District is very like that under the Mogal rulers, and no help can be received by the people from the Government officers. The latter do not pay the slightest attention to the welfare of the people. The only object of importance with them is the collection of Government revenues. The consequence of this is that the people of this district derive no benefit from Government. Mr. Keyser, the present Collector of Sátára, is known to be a clever, experienced and active officer. But his cleverness and experience are for the benefit of Government and are of very little use to the rayats. He strikes terror into the hearts of his subordinates alone. It seems that he is very little feared by criminals. It is true that by the laxity of the law the people have become unrestrained, but it is the business of a high officer like the Collector to acquaint Government with this state of things. The Collector is the Rája of the district and he must supply the wants of his rayats. If he does not make arrangements to restrain criminals and to call them to account, who will do it? Indeed, he may have in doing so sometimes to practise oppression on the criminal classes on account of legal difficulties, but it is allowable to do so on occasions of emergency. The principle of English law that it is better that a hundred offenders should escape punishment than that one innocent person should suffer injustice is good. But what is the use of it if criminals have become uncontrollable? Our opinion is that for the sake of a hundred people it is necessary that those four or five persons who are troublesome to them should be thrown into the sea. Nobody will object to the doing of injustice with a view to keep criminals under effective check. The only thing to be looked to in doing such injustice is that there should be neither partiality nor bias. A well-meaning and straightforward officer has nothing to fear either in this world or in the next. The Mámlatdárs who are subordinate to the Collector must also remember this thing in their conduct. The present Mámlatdár of Válva, Ráo Sáheb Wágle, is learned and may be clever in office business, but we at any rate do not think that he is an energetic and smart executive officer. He inspires no awe into the minds of the people. How far criminals may be afraid of him can be easily imagined from the conduct implying contempt of court which one or two impudent parties were recently guilty of before him while he was doing magisterial work. This táluka requires at the present moment a strict Mámlatdár in order that crime may be put down. The same is the case with some other tálukas in the district. The present is not the time when one should act quite in conformity with the laws. We therefore recommend the present Collector of Sátára to consider our writing with a view to find out what is acceptable therein.

A gang of robbers in Kánara.

35. A correspondent, writing from Bankikodla, a village in Kánara, to the Kannadă Suvárte (144) in its issue of the 15th March, says:—A gang of black people similar to the "golden gang" on the G. I. P. Railway is working in this village and people are put to much trouble by it. We earnestly request Government to keep a police station in this village as a check upon this gang.

Alleged ill-treatment of females by ruffians at the annual Hindu Maháshivarátri fair near the Clifton, Karáchi, and remarks on the conduct of the Karáchi police on the occasion.

36. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 2nd March, says:—The annual Hindu fair of Maháshivarátri took place with its usual gatherings near the Clifton on Thursday last. Among the worshippers of the god the fair sex formed a great source of earning for the keepers of the temple. All would have passed off quietly, but for the notorious fact that the poor, delicate sex suffered more or less at the hands of the ruffians, some of whom even ventured to outrage their modesty by laying violent hands on them, to the great excitement of the respectable and law-abiding people and without interference on the part of the police constables. It is an utter shame that the guardians of the peace should have merely looked stolidly on, while the decency and morality of females was being so audaciously violated and obscene songs were being freely sung. We understand that it was within the cognizance of the police officials to take steps against these budmashes and to bring the whole lot to justice. The same paper, in its issue of the 6th March, says:—We have received many complaints against the utter negligence and inability of the police in checking the Pardeshi ruffians from their brutalities towards the fair sex. In spite of their repeated appeals to the police authorities for the safety of their wives and daughters, the poor Baniás could not get the police to take action. Some men had to fall back to their own strength and to fight out their way through throngs of budmashes. The censure passed by the late City Magistrate upon the inefficiency of the Karáchi police has not roused the authorities to take prompt action to raise their status. The Holi festival is approaching and we warn the police to take proper measures so that the shameful scenes of Shivarátri may not be re-enacted. This will be the best opportunity for the police to make amends for their past inability. If they fail this time, they will be marked with a deep brand of infamy and the people of Karáchi should protest against the miserable farce of a police force, so that the very department may be overhauled from top to bottom.

Inconvenience caused to the people of Karáchi by the present postal and telegraphic arrangements in that town.

37. The Sind Sudhár (167), in its issue of the 2nd March, says:—About five years ago the trading population of Karáchi pointed out that considerable inconvenience was experienced by it for want of telegraph and post offices in the town, and on the recommendation of the Sind Sabha branch telegraph and post offices were established in the town. But the hardship complained of has not been wholly removed. The branch telegraph office is now closed at 6 P.M. Merchants and others having occasion to send telegrams at night are obliged to go to the chief telegraph office, which is far removed from the town. There they are detained for a long time owing, perhaps, to pressure of work or insufficient establishment. If the branch post office is ordered to be kept open till 10 P.M. the inconvenience complained of will be removed. The Sind Sabha has written to the Deputy Post Master General on the subject, and we hope that he will give the subject his careful consideration, and in communication with the Superintendent of Telegraphs make some suitable arrangement in the matter.

PART II.—Legislation.

Comments on the Bombay Village Sanitation Bill, No. 1 of 1889.

38. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 10th March, quotes the three classes into which villages have been divided for the purposes of the Bombay Village Sanitation Bill, No. 1 of 1889, and remarks:—Now, in the first place, we should like to ask what this classification means. In all these there is absolutely no sanitation whatever; no desire to improve; no funds to pay. The first group of voluntary reformers will be left out of the clutches of the law; but we do not know what villages will fall under that group. Towns and cities—let us say civilized towns and cities—have not yet shown such a zeal for sanitary reform, and to talk therefore of villages acting as volunteers is to say something which we in our intimate knowledge of our village communities cannot bring ourselves to believe to exist. But if by the first group is meant those villages which the old Bill did not recognise, we most emphatically oppose such exclusion. We have in reviewing the Sanitary Commissioner's report for 1887 clearly shown the unwisdom of such a course. So far as the second and third groups are concerned, the Bill makes provision for a more stringent control by establishing therein constituted bodies. Here too we are disappointed, because the constitution clauses do not hold out any hope of the revival of the village system. The Collector is made the monarch of all he surveys, and the sanitary officer is nowhere. What we want is that into these villages should be introduced the system of election, the Government being represented by the revenue pátil, the village accountant and the village school-master. The Government and the popular representatives should constitute a board working in direct consultation with the sanitary advisers of Government. We should like the Collector to serve as the god coming down to distribute prizes and to award punishment at the end of a fixed period. The Bill then makes no provision for funds. That the people can pay a sanitation tax is a statement which facts will not bear out. The idea of reviving the baluta system so as to secure the services of the hereditary village Mhárs is good, but unless Government is prepared to spend a portion of its revenue on sanitary reform nothing real will be achieved.

Disapproval of the Bombay Village Sanitation Bill.

39. The Poona Vaibhav (49), in its issue of the 10th March, says:—The Bombay Village Sanitation Bill is unnecessarily oppressive to poor villagers. One of the sections of this Bill lays down that a list of persons above 18 and below 55 years in every village should be prepared, that the persons whose names will be entered therein should gather together on a day fixed by the Mámlatdár of the táluka and should remove the filth and kachra from the village to a place which the Mámlatdár may assign for it, and that whoever will refuse to do so will be punished with fine or imprisonment. Although the villagers are poor they will rather die than do the work of a scavenger, and to punish them with fines would simply be a mockery. What do the people who do not get sufficient food to eat care for sanitation and health? If Government really pity their condition they should do for them as much as can be done from the local fund that is collected from them without making them pay anything extra for it. The ideas of sanitation of our Government are accompanied by vaccination, medical, educational and municipal departments, and when so many departments reach the villagers they will totally ruin them within a year or so. Instead of prolonging their lives the Bill is sure to shorten them. We do not at all understand how the Village Sanitation Act will be enforced without practising much oppression upon villagers. Government are sure to make themselves unpopular, and so we think it better for them to resort to some popular means of preserving the sanitation of villages. Until Government declared themselves to be the owners of the whole land in a village the villagers kept it quite clean. If they will even now acknowledge the ownership of villagers in the land in a village, they will find the village in good sánitary condition. If this proposal is not approved of, we suggest that Government should assign a certain portion of the local fund of each village for its sanitation.

40. With reference to the Bombay Village Sanitation Bill, a correspondent of the Jagad-hitechchhu (13), in its issue of the 9th March, says:—So far as the Konkan districts are concerned, the proposed law can be of little use except as an instrument of oppression on the people. The Bill is intended to supply two main wants, namely, village conservancy and a supply of pure water. As for conservancy, the Konkan villages are in no need of it. It being indispensable to burn every bit of culturable land before sowing, sweepings of all kinds are carefully collected and stored for subsequent use, and public roads and other quarters are kept very clean, while respectable persons and village authorities prohibit the commission of nuisances that are prejudicial to public health. With regard to water-supply, since the municipality of Ratnágiri has found it beyond its ability to supply its want in this matter, there is no probability whatever of villages being able to make a similar provision without their being subjected to considerable hardship. The existing Government medical dispensaries are sufficient for the wants of the people, who are quite satisfied with the vegetable medical drugs for which the Konkan is reputed. The Bill contains a provision to the effect that if a táluka or a district local board refuses to render pecuniary help to a village sanitation board, and if the people fail to supply funds of their own accord, the Collector of the district will have authority to levy taxes for the necessary funds. Is it not strange that a village that contributes to the local fund should have no right whatever to get pecuniary help for the purpose of providing for its own sanitation, and should have to ask for it as if the local board was to be entreated to render eleemosynary assistance? Another provision of the Bill directs that the writing work of the village sanitation board will be performed by the village kulkarni. In the Konkan the duties of a pátil and kulkarni are performed by a Khot, and it would be most unjust to ask him to serve the board, especially when he has been deprived of his ancient rights by Government. There is a further provision in the Bill that the persons who already hold inám lands for doing village conservancy work are to do their work under the supervision of the board. But they being the servants of the Khot, Government have no right to call upon them to perform any extra work. In short, the proposed Bill is nothing more than a plea to raise further taxes and ought to be strongly protested against.

PART III.—Education.

Season schools for agriculturists' children.

41. The Subodh Patrika (16), in its issue of the 10th March, advocates the establishment by Government of what it calls season schools for the benefit of agriculturists' children, and says that they should be open during those seasons when there is little agricultural work such as sowing, reaping, harvesting, &c., to be done, and then too for three hours in the day, say, from 11 A. M. to 2 P. M., so that mornings and evenings may well be left free to be devoted to field work.

The Sanskrit scholarship of Dr. Bhándárkar and other Sanskritists of this presidency who have studied the language according to Europe mode questioned.

42. In the first of a promised series of articles, the Bodh Sudhákar (6), in its issue of the 13th March, depreciates the Sanskrit scholarship of Professor R. G. Bhándárkar of the Deccan College, Poona, and other Sanskritists of this presidency who have studied that language by the mode of tuition adopted in Government high schools and colleges or rather the European mode of instruction, and extols the Native system and the scholarship of the Shástris. As a commencement the Sudhákar finds fault with Dr. Bhándárkar for having made in his first book of Sanskrit a distinction among consonants other than that adopted by the great Pánini.

PART IV.—Railways.

Inconvenience caused to railway passengers by the removal of the steamer "Maddock" from Kotri in Sind and a request to the railway authorities in the matter.

43. The Sind Sudhár (167), in its issue of the 2nd March, says:—Since the removal of the steamer "Maddock" from Kotri, railway passengers have been put to considerable inconvenience. The Sind Sabha represented the matter to the railway authorities on several occasions, but was informed in reply that the steamer was urgently required at Sukkur and that on the completion of the railway bridge steps would be taken to send it back to Kotri. Seeing that the bridge has now been completed, we hope that the railway authorities will fulfil their promise and order the "Maddock" to be sent back to Kotri.

District municipalities and the cost of the maintenance of hospitals and dispensaries.

44. The Hitechchhu (80) of Ahmedabad of the 14th March disapproves of the mofussil municipalities being burdened by the Bombay Government with the cost of maintaining hospitals and dispensaries and of the suggestion made to them by Government for the imposition of a house-tax with a view to meet this expenditure, and observes that Government have erred in not suggesting the levy of the poll-tax, which was instituted by the former Mogal emperors of India and which is much better and easier to collect, the poor being, if Government so wish, excluded from its operation. It adds satirically that the memory of the former emperors will thereby be revived and that the public will thank the Government and the municipalities for it.

The recent general elections at Poona pronounced unsatisfactory.

45. In connection with the recent municipal general elections at Poona, the Dnyán Chakshu (9), in its issue of the 13th March, says:—The voters' list prepared for the elections was anything but correct, inasmuch as the names of many well-known persons were omitted from it, for instance those of Ráo Bahádur Khanderáo Chimanráo Bedárkar and Ráo Bahádur Náráyan Bhikáji Joglekar. Moreover, the surnames of the voters were not given and this created a good deal of confusion. It is complained that some of the municipal commissioners spread false reports against Ráo Bahádurs Bhide and Kánitkar in order to secure a large number of votes in favour of their own friends among the candidates. It is also said that some of the voters,—and among them were most of the teachers of the local High School and the New English School and University graduates,—refrained from exercising their full right to give all the four votes in order to support their own friends among the candidates. It is hoped that Government will elect Ráo Bahádurs Bhide and Kánitkar. In a word, the elections of this year have not been satisfactory.

A recommendation for filling up certain vacancies in the Belgaum municipal commission.

46. The Belgaum Samáchár (23), in its issue of the 11th March, says:—Messrs. Piráji Vyankáji Mestri and Rámchandra Shridhar, two municipal commissioners for the town of Belgaum, have recently died and Dr. Hari Vithal, another commissioner, will presently retire, and thus there will be three vacancies in the commission. It is to be hoped that the Collector of Belgaum, who is to make appointments to these vacancies, will recommend to Government Messrs. Khadir Sáheb Báshbán, Chintámanráo Tátya Khare and Rámchandra Sadáshiv Hervádkar for the vacant commissionerships. Mr. Khadir Sáheb was a commissioner from the day of the first establishment of the municipality up to within a short time ago, when through some mistake he was left out. The appointment of the other two gentlemen will be very acceptable to the people of Belgaum.

Government nominees on the Ahmedabad municipal corporation.

47. The Gujarát Gazette (77) of the 14th March approves of the selection of Government nominees on the Ahmedabad municipal corporation, remarks that the only matter for regret is the omission of the Nagar Seth's family from it, and hopes that the commissioners, a majority of whom are educated and experienced men, will act peaceably for the public good instead of dividing themselves into opposing parties, as has been the case during the last three years. [The Nyáyadarshak (122) of the 11th March is, however, dissatisfied with the selection of Government nominees on the local municipality, says that many of the nominated commissioners are relatives and friends of the municipal president, Mr. Ranchhodlál, who has thus strengthened his party, complains of the omission from the list of nominated members of learned, well-to-do and respectable citizens and wants to know the reason thereof. The paper is afraid that Mr. Ranchhodlál will now be enabled to conduct municipal affairs according to his own wishes and that he will increase the taxes and the municipal debt, and remarks that ignorant people will thereby blame the Government. The Ahmedabad Times (86) and the Rájyabhakt (127) of the 12th March also express dissatisfaction with the selection made by Government.]

Alleged carelessness on the part of officers of the Surat Municipality in preparing the list of persons entitled to vote at the last municipal elections in that town.

48. A correspondent of the Gujaráti (78), in its issue of the 10th March, says:—The proverbial indifference of the officers of the Surat Municipality is apparent in the preparation of the voters' lists. In these lists I see the names of people who exist only in the imagination of those who prepared the lists, while the names of about forty residents legally entitled to vote are omitted from each ward. The municipality has thus deprived about three or four hundred men of the franchise which was given them by the Legislature. The elections of Thursday are, therefore, if not illegal at least unjust. Cannot the authorities order a new election? I should like to know what excuse there is for this omission on the part of those responsible for the preparation of the voters' lists. With reference to the subject, I am sorry to notice that the municipal authorities do not give due publicity to the Government Resolution of 14th January 1885. Unless people know its purport it is impossible for them to protest against blunders in the voters' lists, in the preparation of which the greatest amount of care possible is necessary.

Outbreak of cholera in Broach and the local municipality.

49. The Broach Samáchár (94), in its issue of the 14th March, refers to the strong outbreak of cholera in Broach, complains of the indifference of the municipality to the sanitation and cleanliness of the town and of the want of stringent measures to stop it and of a separate place where poor strangers in that town attacked by cholera can be treated, and suggests that caste feasts should be stopped at once. [The Anonymous (89) of Broach, in its issue of the 10th March, also complains against the local municipality in this matter.]

City survey cases in Ahmedabad and the way adopted by the local municipality and the Government for clearing off the heavy arrears of these cases.

50. The Hitechchhu (80) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 14th March, states that the income derived by the local City Survey Department is shared by the municipality and the Government, that the Ahmedabad Municipality and the Bombay Government in June or July last agreed to pay 8 annas for each case to Khán Bahádur P. H. Dastur, Deputy Collector and Magistrate, Ahmedabad, for disposing of the city survey cases of encroachments on the public road by private parties which were in arrears to the number of about 8,000, and that Mr. Dastur is said to have already decided about half this number. The paper ridicules this system of having cases decided, which it terms a contract system, satirically recommends its adoption in the administration of justice by the Government and by England and America, and adds that the public press should thank and praise the wise municipal commissioners of Ahmedabad and the Bombay Government for it.

Water-supply for the town of Násik and the local municipality.

51. The Násik Vritt (46), in its issue of the 9th March, states that the municipality of Násik is poor, that the town being a sacred place is mainly inhabited by mendicant Bráhmans, that the town is situated on the banks of the river Godávari which flows quite close to it and the water of which is pure, healthy, and possesses even medicinal qualities during the larger portion of the year, that the municipal taxes are already heavy there being a pilgrim tax and a tax on carriages and horses, and that there being no need of a fresh water-supply the corporation need not incur the cost of nearly four lákhs and a half of rupees and increase the burden of taxation. In conclusion, the Vritt points out that if in spite of these circumstances the heavy expenditure for a fresh water-supply is undergone the burden of municipal taxes will largely increase, and several emergent works will have to be neglected, as has happened in the case of the town of Junnar in the Poona District, and therefore hopes that Government will desist from exercising pressure on the municipality to arrange for providing a water-supply.

Alleged high-handedness of Colonel Mayhew, Collector of Shikárpur, with regard to the appointment of secretary to the local municipality.

52. The Káthiáwár Times (82), in its issue of the 13th March, says:—The Karáchi Phœnix rightly takes to task Colonel Mayhew, Collector of Shikárpur, for ordering the chairman of the Shikárpur Municipality not to allow Mr. Masand, who was at a general meeting of the corporation elected municipal secretary and duly appointed on probation for two months, to join the post. It appears that the Collector has advertised for a European or a Eurasian candidate for the place, but it is not apparent under what authority he has acted thus. Unless the man is corrupt or incompetent, the Collector cannot even suggest the cancellation of his appointment, much less peremptorily order its cancellation. Nothing in the Municipal Act, we believe, empowers a Collector in his capacity of president to set at naught the decision arrived at at a general meeting. The Municipal Act leaves to municipalities entire discretion of appointing their own men.

Government should certainly call for an explanation from the Collector for his having advertised that "none but a European or Eurasian need apply for the post." We remember to have read some time ago in a Karáchi newspaper something to the effect that it was very difficult for the secretary to manage affairs with the bloated Baniás, and the last secretary was said to have asserted that "no honourable man could satisfactorily perform the duties of a secretary to the Shikárpur Municipality." These constant bickerings of municipalities are anything but creditable, and deal deadly blows to the legitimate aspirations of intelligent Natives.

Alleged want of independence in the commissioners of the Shikárpur Municipality.

53. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 9th March, writes:—We have spoken strongly about the action of the Collector of Shikárpur, but what shall we say of the commissioners, who at the bidding of the Collector and to avoid the risk of displeasing the mighty official, have thrown over a man of their choice only a week after he had been chosen. On the 21st February Mr. Masand was elected unanimously and on the 28th he was dismissed by a majority, without his ever having been so much as even permitted to join the post and much less tried. The facts speak for themselves. There is no real independence amongst the members as a body, or if there be any it is completely and effectually crushed down by the fear of official displeasure. We do not know the number and the names of the members who were present on the two occasions, viz., the 21st and 28th February. Nor do we know the strength or the names of the majority on the second occasion which in obedience to the imperious will of the Collector set aside its own action after seven days. So we cannot really say who are to blame for the cowardice displayed at the meeting of the 28th February. But this much is apparent that the days of Johukums and Huzurki marzi have not yet ended and that an official president can have his own way whenever he chooses. When such a spectacle is presented by the Shikárpur Municipality, what must be the state of the minor municipalities in the district of Shikárpur?

PART VI.—Native States.

Alleged treasonable practices by His Highness the Mahárája of Kashmere and the necessity for improving the relations between Residents and Political Agents and the Native Princes.

54. The Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 12th March, refers to the alleged attempt on the part of His Highness the Mahárája of Kashmere to poison Mr. Plowden, late British Resident at the Mahárája's court, as stated by a correspondent of the Pioneer, says that the news in question is painful and points out the necessity for Government taking measures to alter and to improve the relations existing between Native Princes and the Residents and Political Agents at their courts. It says that the strained relations between Colonel Phayre and the late Malhár Ráo Gáikwád of Baroda and between Her Highness the Begum of Bhopál and other States in Central India and Sir Lepel Griffin, and the conduct of the British Resident towards the late Mahárája Holkar, of Abdul Hak in Hyderabad (Deccan) aided by the late Resident there, of Colonel Marshall towards His Highness the Nizám of Hyderabad and of some Political Agents in Káthiáwár are well-known. Numerous other similar instances can, the paper remarks, be found out on enquiry. What then must be the cause? There must be something unpleasant in the relations of the Native Princes with the Residents and Political Agents by which the former get tired of the latter and in some cases even go so far as to meanly attempt to poison them. It is a well-known fact that the Residents and Political Agents sometimes subject the Princes to great pressure and it is no wonder that a bad impression should in consequence be made upon their minds. Such a state of things is likely to be more injurious than beneficial to Government, and it is necessary that the latter should take precautionary measures to improve it.

Contemplated abolition of Darbár Vakils at the Political Agency office in Káthiáwár approved.

55. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 10th March, says:—All things considered, we are in favour of abolishing the Darbár Vakil or representative at the Agency office in Káthiáwár. What is there that the Vakil could represent better, from the Agency to the Darbár or from the Darbár to the Agency, than might be done by the ordinary routine? Special arrangements might be made for special occasions. A Darbár Vakil in these days has become an anachronism. It is true that when the Daftardár and the Vakil are brothers-in-law (not by marriage but by profession) the latter makes an excellent spy. His Highness thinks it convenient to have such a man in his service, till one day he finds that the Vakil can spy upon the Darbár as cleverly as he can spy upon the Agency—the knife of wickedness cuts either way. Not the least objectionable feature of this sham Vakil system is that it swells the camp of the Political Agent and of his Assistants (there is a vakil, we believe, for the chief Agent, and one for each of his Assistants, and we should not be surprised if there are private vakils even for Deputy Assistants). We have seldom seen a political officer's camp in Káthiáwár without being reminded of the settling of locusts on some unhappy land. From Sáheb to his cart-driver, each one may have to be fed by the Darbár and to be kept in good humour. It is no use Government blaming the Chief for doing what he cannot do or ought not to do. The right course is to forbid the acceptance of such hospitality; the Agency officers and men must pay for what they receive in the bazár, the Darbár seeing that such bazár is within reach. There may be the most perfect administration of justice in Káthiáwár, but so long as a system like that we have been noticing continues, the people cannot be convinced of such administration. [The Rájyabhakt (127) of the 12th March also approves of the abolition of Darbár Vakils at the Political Agency office in Káthiáwár, and says that the tyrannical conduct of Vakils Savji and Jádavrái in the time of Colonels Barton and Wodehouse and the intrigues of Vakil Rudarji of Junágad are well-known, and that it has in its possession particulars of the evil deeds of the Darbár Vakils. The paper requests His Excellency Lord Reay to speedily order the contemplated abolition of Darbár Vakils regardless of the opinions of the Political Agents in the matter, and hopes that His Excellency will also stop the tours of political officers, as the necessary information can now be got easily by means of the railway, the telegraph and other facilities. It adds that such a noble Governor as His Excellency Lord Reay and such a just Secretary to Government as Mr. Lee-Warner are being already praised by the public, that the people of Káthiáwár are delighted at the news in question, and that the reform should be carried out regardless of any obstacles that may come in the way. A few other papers also approve of the contemplated abolition of Darbár Vakils at the Agency office in Káthiáwár.]

The people and the Native States of Káthiáwár and a petition prepared by the editor and proprietor of the Rájyabhakt newspaper to His Excellency Lord Reay on their behalf.

56. The Rájyabhakt (127), in its issue of the 12th March, publishes a further instalment of the petition which its editor and proprietor has prepared for presentation to His Excellency Lord Reay on behalf of the people and Native Princes of Káthiáwár, takes the Bhávnagar State in hand, mentions several misdeeds done during the Divánship of the late Mr. Sámaldás, and observes that besides these evil deeds there has been a large number of cases in which the Kárbháris and their partisans are guilty of murders, intrigues, false accusations, bribery and treachery, and that the Bhávnagar Darbár was enjoying itself all the time in the same way as Nero was playing upon the fiddle while Rome was in flames. [The Ahmedabad Times (86) of the 12th March supports the petition prepared by the editor and proprietor of the Rájyabhakt, complains of the oppression practised by His Highness the Thákor of Wadhwán on his relatives and subjects, thinks that the Thákor is not second in misdeeds to the late Malhár Ráo Gáikwád of Baroda and Kálubha of Jámnagar who were deported by Government, and states that it is ready to enter into a contract for the purchase of offices in the Political Agency, which exercises a mighty sway over the Native Princes and the people. The paper adds that Government ought to interfere in the management of Wadhwán for the good of the State and its people.]

Complaints against Mr. Hiráchand Velji, Manager, Gángad.

57. The Nyáyadarshak (122), in its issue of the 11th March, refers to the complaints made by Mr. Nánbha Gagubha, Tálukdár, Gángad, against Mr. Hiráchand Velji, the Manager (vide paragraph 67, page 30 of the Report on Native Papers, No. 8 of 1889), and says that the Bombay Government ought to appoint an independent European officer to enquire into the matter as such a course will bring to light the misappropriation of the Tálukdár's money as complained of by him or the giving of bribes. [The Praja Mat (125) of the 9th and the Hitechchhu (80) of Ahmedabad of the 14th March also wish that Government should enquire into the complaint, the former suggesting that it should be heard by a judicial tribunal. The Satyavakta (131), in its issue of the 15th March, publishes a letter from Báshriba Kuwarba, mother of Mr. Nánbha Gagubha, in which she gives an explanation in the matter, thinks that her son has been set up to complain against Mr. Hiráchand Velji by Báshriba Májirájba of Sántalpar, a co-wife of her husband, and by her partisans, and regrets that her son should keep the company of such low men as speak well of those who have harmed the táluka and ill of those who have done good to it.]

Remarks on the judicial system in Berár.

1. The Berár Samáchár (3), in its issue of the 11th March, says:—What we do expect in the new judicial scheme is a radical change in the system of appointments to judicial offices. If the present system goes on, the province will not be a whit better. The mere change of name would do us no good. It is no use changing the mere form, but the spirit and substance should also be changed. So also in the matter of judicial work turned out by the officers now on the bench, there must be a radical change in the theory that regulates judicial work at present. The present idea is that the number of cases decided by a judge is an index of his abilities and fitness for holding office. But mere quantitative results are useless and unmeaning unless they also weigh considerably in the scale qualitatively. If one judge decides a greater number of cases than another, surely that is some test of his despatch of work, but if his decisions do not come up to the standard, the mere amount is altogether useless. Remarks are often noticed in the yearly reports that Mr. So-and-So, judge, decided so many cases; but the quality of the work turned out, which more than anything else ought to be commented upon, is never noticed. If this is the guiding theory, we must expect corresponding results. The judges in the Lower Court want to show off a certain number as decided during the month; and they have to resort to a number of dodges for the purpose. Issuing summonses for final disposal in cases which really cannot be disposed of at the first hearing, dismissing cases for default of parties, and want of proper attention to the evidence before them, are some of the results of this mischievous theory. The courts have, according to the strict letter of the law, an undoubted power of issuing summonses for final disposal, and also to dismiss cases when parties do not appear in time. But if both are indiscriminately used the result must be a failure of justice. But what is to be done? Higher authorities look to numbers, and dismissals for default is the easiest way to show off disposals and disburthen a heavy file. Duration of cases is another bugbear. Explanations are often required of the lower judges why certain cases required a certain number of days. We can understand the solicitude of Government in this matter. People ought to get speedy justice; but at the same time it must be remembered that undue haste is as bad as, and even worse than, tardy justice; and especially so when the appellate courts are inclined to agree with the lower courts and the chances of reversal are so few. In the Bombay Presidency if a case exceeds one year in duration the judges have to submit an explanation, but not before that time. The only thing to be watched by the superior courts is that the lower courts do properly use their time; and to guard against waste of time and neglect of duty by the lower courts it will be enough if a daily diary is called for by the district courts from the lower courts. This will give the higher courts an insight into the work of the judges, and if it is found that their time is fully occupied it can never be said to their discredit that they have not been able to give so many more decisions. And if Government want to see good work, and that speedily, they must appoint a greater number of judges than at present.

A request to the Commissioner, Hyderabad Assigned Districts, to allow a general holiday on the 1st of April next, the day of municipal elections in Berár.

2. The Pramod Sindhu (1), in its issue of the 8th March, says:—We quite agree with the resolution of the Managing Committee of the Berár Sárvajanik Sabha to request the Commissioner, Hyderabad Assigned Districts, to close all public offices and courts in the municipal towns in Berár on the day of the municipal elections. We can safely say that a considerable portion of intelligent voters consists of Government servants, pleaders, and sáwkárs. If members of those classes be barred from going to the polling offices, as they shall necessarily be if the public business be not stopped on that day, we are afraid no proper elections will be made and thus the efficiency of the new system is likely to suffer. In the Bombay Presidency such privilege was allowed. We hope that Mr. Plowden, with his usual foresight, will earnestly consider the Committee's request and our suggestion and will take steps to allow a general holiday on the 1st of April next in all municipal towns. We also suggest to the managers of large firms, factories and presses that for the reasons stated above they too should allow a holiday to their employés on the day of the elections.

Robberies on the road leading from Budnera to Amráoti.

3. The same newspaper learns that on Saturday, the 2nd March, some robbers attacked a carriage passing by the road leading from Budnera to Amráoti and forcibly took away ornaments that were worn by women sitting in it, and says that nowadays highway robberies are frequently committed on the road and that the police authorities should direct their attention to the matter.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Necessity for reform of the administration of British India.

1. The Dnyán Ságar (28), in its issue of the 18th March, publishes the last of the series of articles that it has been publishing for some time past on the difference between the past and the present. In the present article the paper pathetically refers to outrages committed more or less frequently in Assam and other parts of India by low Europeans on Native women with impunity and with the connivance of the higher Government authorities, and to the extensive slaughter of cows going on in India under the British rule to the great annoyance of the religious feelings of the people and to their material adversity, and remarks that the former beneficent character of the British rule has of late undergone a change for the worse, that the people have come to see the advantages of local self-government and to entertain a desire for it, and that therefore it is necessary for Government in their own interests to favourably and carefully listen to the demands of the Indian National Congress and to keep up their dignity by acceding to its prayers, as, otherwise, peaceful Shivájis like Mr. Parnell, M. P., and Washington will appear in the country, as there are signs of their so doing, and compel Government to reform the administration.

Mr. Dádábhái Navroji and the right of the Bombay people to return him as member of Parliament for Bombay.

2. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 17th March, publishes the following letter from "Bacon," who, it says, is a respectable gentleman in Bombay:—The remarkable ovations everywhere given to Mr. Dádábhái Navroji from one end of Great Britain to the other, more especially at Newcastle-on-Tyne, as recorded in last week's Times of India, set one athinking what is to be done with him in the event of his failure to be returned to Parliament for the district of the Metropolis upon which he seems to have set his heart? And in thinking over the matter a new idea has struck me; novel it may be, but not unworthy of consideration. It is this—that the Island of Bombay has, by the law of England, a strict legal right to be represented in the Imperial Parliament; therefore, in the event of his failure elsewhere, we might return him as our member. Is this a dream or a reality? Let us see. The Island of Bombay was a part of the marriage dowry of the Infanta of Portugal, who was married to King Charles II. in the year 1661. The inhabitants thereby and then became British subjects. In 1669 the king granted it in fee to the East India Company. The words of the grant are—"To be holden of us and our heirs as of the manor of E. Greenwich in free and common socage, at a rent of £10 in gold payable yearly." The charter goes on to say—"That all and every person, being our subjects, which do or shall inhabit within the said port and island, and every of their children and posterity which shall happen to be born within the precincts and limits thereof, shall have and enjoy all liberties, franchises, immunities, capacities and abilities of free denizens and natural-born subjects within any of our dominions to all intents and purposes, as if they had been abiding and born within this our kingdom of England." Now, it is clear that under this charter the Island of Bombay is not only a part and parcel of England (for it is held of the Crown as the manor of E. Greenwich), but that its inhabitants have all the rights and privileges of persons abiding and born in England. Now, what are these rights and privileges? Amongst others, to send a representative to the Imperial Parliament. When there was a property qualification even this would be no objection, because the Island of Bombay is by the charter virtually in England. If the abstract proposition meets with your views, there will be no difficulty, the votes being now by ballot in England, as to the mode in which it is to be carried into effect. With this charter in his hand the House of Commons could not well refuse Mr. Dádábhái Navroji admittance as Member of Parliament for Bombay.

Punishment to be inflicted upon the London Times for its failure in proving the charges brought by it against Mr. Parnell, M.P.

3. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 17th March, says:—Never was a fiasco more complete than that experienced by the London Times. The Times is great, and the Parnellites also form a great party. The Commission consists of great judges and the counsels engaged are also great, and great are the issues involved in this great trial. And the fiasco is also splendid. The letters are found to be forgeries and the witness

Mr. Pigott, who was introduced with such a flourish of trumpets, utterly collapsed. It is all well that ends well, and Mr. Parnell, M.P., fully deserves all the congratulations showered upon him. But what will be the atonement for the Times for publishing the forged letters? In the Kolhápur case the editors of the Mahrátta and the Kesari newspapers were awarded six months' imprisonment each for publishing letters which turned out to be forgeries. The editors of those papers were at least equally, if not more, innocent than the editor of the Times, and yet they were punished. The Parnell trial resembles in many respects the Kolhápur trial, and we should like to know how the editor of the Times will be dealt with. If he escapes scot-free, then we must say that there are different measures in England and India for meting out justice.

Attitude of the Prime Minister and Secretary of State for India towards the reform of the Indian Legislative Councils proposed by the Earl of Dufferin commented upon.

4. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 17th March, writes:—We have to thank the Bombay Gazette for being the first to prepare the intelligent community of this country for a sad disappointment that is in store for it. Ever since the introduction of the local self-government scheme by Lord Ripon, the question of the reform of the Legislative Councils of India has attracted considerable attention. At first the cry was vague, but it gradually gained in clearness of sound and the four Indian National Congresses held up to date have reiterated the demand in emphatic words. In fact, of all the questions which have stirred the public mind during the past few years none has called forth such an unanimity of opinion as the reform of the Indian Legislative Councils has done. The public utterances of Lord Dufferin contributed in no small degree to strengthen this desire and to bring it to a point. Even in that post-prandial oration of his at St. Andrew's dinner that was disappointing in so many ways, there was yet one thing which partly made amends for the rest, namely, His Lordship's assurance that he had recommended to the Home authorities for consideration a scheme for the reform of the Legislative Councils. There was thus good ground to hope that the question would meet with a speedy and agreeable disposal at the hands of those authorities. But those who depended on this expectation will soon be rudely awakened. We do not know how this disappointment will tell upon the most enthusiastic advocates of the measure. Those who have carefully watched the policy of the two great parties in England towards India will not be surprised at the attitude taken up by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for India. His Excellency Lord Lansdowne too, we are told, "is more in accord with Her Majesty's advisers than with his predecessor in office." If it indeed be so, then we are afraid that it will be looked upon as an ominous indication of the policy to be pursued during the present rule. "More cautious counsels" are in the ascendant, they say, as if Lord Dufferin was a man likely to be carried away by radical fads. Lord Dufferin is a Liberal, but he is more a Liberal of the good old type than of the modern ultra-radical kind. He has given ample proof of his sagacity, prudence and wise statesmanship. He was not the man to propose rash steps involving grave constitutional changes. He had felt his ground, and weighed well the pros and cons before he made the recommendation. The decision of such a one is to be set aside for the opinion of one who seems to have made up his mind on the question before he set foot in India. The present Viceroy of India is said to be opposed to the introduction of the elective principle at all. Why, indeed, should His Lordship be so dead opposed to make this concession to the popular demand, or rather to the humble prayer of the loyal subjects of Her Majesty, even in the smallest measure and hedged in with proper limitations, we are unable to conceive. The Government of India entertain "the strongest objection to any recognition of the elective principle." We do not know why there should be any objection to the trial of a tentative scheme. For instance, an electorate might be formed of the three great classes of the community—the political, the educational, and the trading. These may be called upon to elect their representatives. Government may reserve to themselves the power of approval. The representatives of the other classes of the community may be nominated by Government. In such a scheme as this there is hardly any room for danger. There is, no doubt, some truth in the assertion that Government nominees in the Legislative Councils are at present sufficiently representative. But the question is how long are the people to be kept at the political feeding-bottle stage? We have outgrown the age, we believe, and if Government are sincere, they ought to recognise the truth of this and give us some stronger nourishment. We do not claim to have the food of the adult or the grown-up man as he gets it in England and elsewhere; yet even these moderate proposals make the hearts of the Conservative statesmen tremble with fear. The Anglo-Indian official stands aghast at the mere mention of the right of interpellation. He is afraid, and justly so, that if the right be once conceded, then farewell to the sweet privileges of officialdom. Hence he advises accordingly. Of course in the Supreme Legislative Council questions about little wars on the frontier and such other matters as the vagaries of the political department might be inconvenient. For the sake of the peace of mind of the Governor-General and his Secretaries the right of interpellation may be held back in the Supreme Council. But the same reason cannot hold good for denying the right to members of the Provincial Legislative Councils; and our people must agitate this question until the concession is made. Perseverance ought to be our motto. Let us knock incessantly and the door will be opened unto us. We must bear in mind that the ultimate decision of the question rests with the House of Commons. To that House, therefore, we must go with our prayer. English opinion on Indian questions must be enlightened. The hands of our Political Agency in England ought to be strengthened. If we work hard, success cannot be far from our reach. [Several other papers disapprove of the rumoured opposition of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne to the reform of the Indian Legislative Councils as proposed by the Earl of Dufferin.]

5. The Shri Shiváji (61), in its issue of the 15th March, says:—We are sure that the people will be exceedingly surprised to hear that His Excellency Lord Lansdowne is opposed to the reform of the Indian Legislative Councils proposed by his predecessor in office. This opposition of the Viceroy will enable the people to form an idea of his future administration of the country. Is it not strange that Lord Cross, who has never visited this country, should be more competent to form an opinion about the wishes of the people of India than Lord Dufferin? It must also be noted that His Excellency Lord Lansdowne considers Lord Dufferin to have committed a mistake in this matter alone. The regard of the people for the British Government would be greatly shaken if they were led to think that the concession of certain rights to them was not sure, even when they succeeded in convincing one Governor-General about the justice of their demands; since whenever it is time for them to obtain new concessions, the officers are changed and some obstacle or other is raised.

His Excellency Lord Lansdowne and the political movements of the natives of India.

6. The Hitechchhu (80) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 21st March, enumerates the public acts of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne since assuming the reins of office as Viceroy of India, disapproves of the order said to have been issued by His Lordship to the police requiring them to watch the political movements of the Natives as stated by the Bengal press, and observes that if this assertion be true, the officers surrounding him must have frightened him, as otherwise he would not have issued such an order without any cause for it and thereby needlessly wounded public feelings. The leaders of the Indian National Congress act, remarks the paper, according to the opinion and rules laid down by the chosen representatives of the people from all parts of the country. The various well-known political associations throughout India are not composed of timid, ignorant and seditious men; their members are loyal, learned and patriotic men. It is improper to order the police to keep a strict eye upon their actions. The police and the people are thereby placed in a difficult position. It is desirable that the Government of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne should give minute consideration to such matters, so that it may not have to repent afterwards.

Confidential circular of the Bombay Government prohibiting public servants from collecting subscriptions intended to promote political purposes of any kind whatever commented upon.

7. The Jáme Jamshed (109), in its issue of the 20th March, publishes in English the confidential circular of the Bombay Government No. 170-5, dated the 15th January last, forwarding to all heads of offices letter from the Secretary to the Government of India, Home Department, prohibiting the participation by public servants in the collection of subscriptions intended to promote political purposes of any kind whatever, and observes:—The circular is unobjectionable in so far as it is not right that a public officer should collect subscriptions for any fund whatever, but since political purposes alone have been selected for prohibition it means that Government have no objection to their officers collecting subscriptions for funds intended for the advancement of other* objects, some of which are certainly objectionable. Again, the above circular is likely to be construed to mean that Government have no sympathy with movements intended to accelerate the political progress of the Natives, and the confidential form given to the circular shows that Government are doubtful about the propriety of the step taken by them and wish that the same should not be discussed in public.

The attitude of Government towards the Indian National Congress.

8. In noticing the great desire shown by the people of Poona that the next meeting of the Indian National Congress should be held in their city, the Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 22nd March, says:—The authorities in the North-West Provinces are collecting information as to the position and influence in society of the representatives of those provinces who took part in the last meeting of the Indian National Congress at Allahabad. This is a new expedient to startle the representatives, but it is not likely to serve any object of Sir Auckland Colvin since he has already incurred the distrust of the people. Lord Dufferin talked sweet, but adopted a policy that tended to sap the very foundations of the Congress. His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's views have not been distinctly known, but it is doubtful whether His Lordship entertains any sympathy for the movement. Under these circumstances Government officials are likely to be prohibited from helping or taking part in the movement, but their help is very necessary for its advancement. Government officials should take particular care for the due and proper discharge of their duties, and should devote their leisure to the work of the Congress, being prepared to protest reasonably against prohibition to act thus.

Place where the next meeting of the Indian National Congress should be held.

9. The Shri Shiváji (61), in its issue of the 15th March, suggests that the next meeting of the Indian National Congress should be held at Poona rather than in Bombay for two reasons, viz., that there should be much agitation in favour of the Congress and that information about the movement should be very widely spread among the masses.

Comments on the decision of the Government of India in the matter of the reduction of the salt-duty in India.

10. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 17th March, says:—It is announced that the Government of India has no present intention of abolishing the increase in the salt-duty. It would have been indeed surprising if the Government had come to any other decision. The salt-duty is so convenient. It can be collected at a little expense. There is hardly any row made about it. If the poor people suffer, why, let them suffer. They put up with it quietly like reasonable beings. We have already pointed out how the consumption of salt has decreased owing to the increase in the duty on it. [The Prabodh Ratnă (51), in its issue of the 21st March, considers it very unjust and cruel on the part of the British Government to deprive poor people of one of the principal articles in their daily food by imposing a duty on salt which, like water and air, is produced spontaneously, and requests Government to pay due regard to public opinion and to earn the blessings of the rayats by altogether abolishing the salt-duty.]

11. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 17th March, disapproves of the conduct of the Government of India in not reducing the salt-duty even when Lord Cross, the Secretary of State for India, has admitted it to be very heavy and pointed out the necessity for its reduction, and says that under the British Government little notice is taken of the conduct of a subordinate who acts against the wishes of his superiors in matters in which the treasury is benefited. [Many other papers express disappointment at the rumoured intention of the Government of India not to reduce the present rate of the salt-duty.]

The proposal to have a first-class dry dock at Bombay to accommodate English men-of-war disapproved.

12. The Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 18th March, says:—The Secretary of State for India recently stated in the House of Lords that he desired to have a first-class dry dock at Bombay that would accommodate first-class men-of-war. But first-class war vessels have never as yet visited this place, and there is little likelihood of their doing so in times of war, as they would be required for the defence of England. Second-class men-of-war do not come here in times of peace, but they might do so in time of war, and a second-class dry dock that the Bombay Port Trustees have decided to construct would accommodate them if they were in need of any repairs. A first-class dock would cost a large amount of money which poor India is not able to afford, and it is to be hoped that Lord Cross will give up his intention to have it, unless England pays for it.

Praise of Her Excellency Lady Reay.

13. The Kaiser-i-Hind (112) of the 17th March is glad to announce that Her Excellency Lady Reay has given her patronage to the new Stri Mitrá periodical intended to meet the wants of the fair sex and conducted by ladies in Gujaráti, and says that the anxiety displayed by this noble lady for the welfare of Native females is apparent from her acts, and that this is fresh encouragement given by her to the cause of female education and the improvement and progress of the sex.

The uproar raised by some of the Home papers against His Excellency Lord Reay in connection with the Crawford case, and a request to the Ministry in the matter.

14. The Yajdán Parast (143), in its issue of the 17th March, writes:—The outcry raised by some newspapers in England to have such a popular Governor as His Excellency Lord Reay removed from his post is so flagrantly selfish that its hollowness is understood full well by the Indian public. It is easy to see that the courage displayed by His Excellency in having such a high officer as Mr. Crawford publicly tried on charges of bribery has enraged some of the Home papers, for they do not like that a high officer, however guilty, should be lowered in the eyes of the Natives. But Lord Reay cared more for justice and the purity of the public service than for the feelings of these writers, and hence the latter have made an uproar to have him removed from the Governorship. Will the Home Government pay any serious attention to it? If the Ministry submit to the outcry, it will do a foolish act and will have to make heavy amends for it in some way. Lord Reay's conduct throughout the Crawford case has been approved of by the public as being in accord with principles of justice, and the uproar raised against it has been set down as interested. If Lord Salisbury, acting on the opinion of some of the Home papers, takes an unpleasant step in this case, it will certainly tend to greatly increase Lord Reay's popularity and renown in this country and to make the Conservative Ministry highly odious.

Praise of His Excellency Lord Reay for his moral courage and denouncement of the conduct of the newspapers and friends and relatives of Mr. Crawford, who have foolishly attacked the Bombay Government for their action against him.

15. The Káthiáwár Times (82), in its issue of the 20th March, says:—The Crawford case and its accompaniments have awakened, as we all know, great interest both in England and in India, and the recent rabid criticisms on the policy of His Excellency the Governor have led people to think that Lord Reay is more or less frightened by them. This derives additional support from the news that six of the Mámlatdárs have been deprived of their criminal powers, and that among them are some who had received from Government a complete immunity. We have never protested against this step, but have, on the contrary, more than once suggested the advisability of not retaining them in the service. Opinions are equally divided as to the acquittal or otherwise of Mr. Crawford, and we do not think that the time has arrived for expressing a decisive opinion either way. The Pioneer lays great stress on the weak points of the prosecution, but it evidently forgets that evidence in State trials has always been not quite conclusive. Add to this the peculiar difficulties of gathering evidence and the overwhelming opposition offered to Government by those who should have been the first to assist them. Punish the incriminated Mámlatdárs by all means, but do not punish them simply to shield Mr. Crawford. The case against Mr. Crawford has not quite collapsed, and never, we believe, will it collapse. There are many grave charges that will have to be considered from a purely moral point of view. His Excellency Lord Reay could not have acted in this matter on his sole responsibility. Individually His Excellency is very little responsible, and it is absolutely uncalled for that he should be so outrageously abused. Should even the prosecution collapse—which, in all probability, will not be the case—His Excellency cannot be blamed. The moral conviction and the motive which led the Governor to institute an enquiry into the Crawford scandal ought to be first considered. Government are bound to discountenance questionable proceedings. There was no personal malice to gratify. Few men will have the courage to face such base and outrageous attacks as have been directed against the Governor. Newspapers that are endeavouring to overawe His Excellency forget that they do great harm to India and to the British service, and that they will be deemed guilty of encouraging crime. The Secretary of State for India has a very difficult task before him, and he will have to decide on the merits of the case. He must not forget that a portion of the public press has helped to prejudice, to a large extent, the minds of the people. It is contended, and no doubt with some show of truth, that Lord Reay exceeded his powers in guaranteeing complete immunity to the incriminated Mámlatdárs. But it must be remembered that the Mámlatdárs, who were exercising magisterial powers and have pretty good knowledge of the law, would never have come forward to give evidence against Mr. Crawford had not this course been adopted. The World newspaper says that the accounts of Lord Reay's administration are unsatisfactory in regard to many other things besides the Crawford Commission. This statement is absolutely unfounded. Among the newspapers that attack Lord Reay by far the most virulent is the Times, which in taking up the position of the universal censor has made itself eminently ludicrous. Never, we believe, has so much palpable nonsense in connection with the Crawford case appeared in any newspaper. It cannot escape the notice of persons of ordinary intelligence that the Times, in accusing the Bombay Government and in endeavouring to lower it, draws away the attention from the real issues of the case.

Disapproval of the conduct of the Bombay Government in depriving certain Mámlatdárs concerned in the Crawford case of their magisterial powers.

16. The Shubh Suchak (62), in its issue of the 15th March, says:—There are reasons to suppose that His Excellency Lord Reay and other members of the Bombay Executive Council and the Secretary of State for India have been really frightened by the agitation set up by the relatives, friends and other well-wishers of Mr. Crawford in his favour. If such had not been the case His Excellency Lord Reay would not certainly have issued orders for depriving Messrs. Deshpánde, Kelkar, Thakár and a few other Mámlatdárs of their magisterial powers. Bribes are given secretly and always unwillingly. If they were given by Mámlatdárs exercising magisterial powers, is it not clear that they must have been forced to do so? In depriving them of their magisterial powers Government have certainly broken their promise of indemnity, on the strength of which the Mámlatdárs came forward to tell the truth. We are not very sorry for the Mámlatdárs, but the assurances of Government will carry no weight hereafter, and there will thus be no means to expose such dark deeds. Who is responsible for this permanent injury? If Government were afraid of public criticism, why did they not pass a small Act legalizing the giving of indemnity to witnesses in such cases? Such an Act was passed by Parliament about the year 1725 in order to secure the exposure of the conduct of a high officer who had sold appointments. His Excellency Lord Reay has shown remarkable courage in the Crawford case, but it will be a matter for regret if he lose it now. Europeans accused of bribery, murders, &c., are allowed to escape scot-free owing to foolish considerations of prestige and to partiality of British justice. The reported result of the Crawford Commission was anticipated by the public. We assure our rulers that according to their partial justice European culprits may be considered not guilty in the eyes of the law, yet they are not so regarded by the public. No matter if numerous Europeans are convicted and harshly punished, but it is most suicidal to trample upon justice under the foolish pretext of prestige.

Mámlatdárs concerned in the Crawford case and the law regarding bribery.

17. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 17th March, says:—If report is to be believed, Mr. Crawford has escaped and the poor Mámlatdárs have to bear the brunt of the odium and the legal consequences of opening their hearts to Government under a guarantee which it is not yet certain how far the latter may stick to. We shall refer to this guarantee affair some other time, but in view of the pending prosecutions against the Mámlatdárs it may be useful to ascertain what their offence amounts to. Under the Penal Code bribe-giving is not a substantial offence, but only an abetment of bribe-taking. In order to convict the Mámlatdárs it will have to be shown that they went a-bribing of their own free will to intentionally corrupt the virtue of a public servant. With Mr. Crawford's notorious indebtedness and his money-agents running over the country seeking to raise the wind somehow or other for their master, we do not think it would be natural to hold that all the bribes were given without any hint or suggestion coming, or supposed to have come, from above. And if this view of the matter turn out to be true, we think the Mámlatdárs can hardly be held guilty. That this is the true interpretation of the criminal law of the land may be seen from Macaulay's notes on the Penal Code Bill.

Remarks on the conduct of the Bombay Government in depriving six Mámlatdárs, some of whom had received indemnity, of their magisterial powers.

18. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 17th March, says:—About six Mámlatdárs have been ordered by the Bombay Government not to exercise magisterial powers, and we learn that they are some of those who received from Government a complete indemnity for making self-incriminating confessions in the Crawford case. We think that the action of Government in this respect is calculated to intensify the distrust already engendered in the public mind by the rumoured acquittal of Mr. Crawford by the Commissioners. Why has the indemnity so solemnly given been broken? The subordinate officers who gave evidence against Mr. Crawford had every reason to put faith in the promise of safety given by the Bombay Government. We do not of course wish to find fault with Government just at this time when they require all the support that independent and right-minded persons can give them. But our anxiety to see justice done makes us feel the position in which the Government of Lord Reay has put itself. To give a promise and then to break it even under pressure is, to say the least of it, looking very small indeed. The same strength with which the proceedings were begun ought to have been preserved to the end. If six Mámlatdárs have been already deprived of their magisterial powers, who knows how many more will be similarly dealt with, or who knows that loss of magisterial powers will be the only injury which will have to be suffered by these unfortunate officials? There are some other matters too which lead the people to think that the Bombay Government are rather frightened at the unfair criticisms that have appeared in some Anglo-Indian and English newspapers. We hope that Lord Reay will uphold what he has already done. He has been just and true to his duty, and we have great faith in his strength.

Remarks in connection with the retention of the corrupt judicial officers in the Government service.

19. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 16th March, says:—The question of the retention of the corrupt judicial officers in the service is raging high. We are sorry to see that some of the newspapers, in their zeal to defend the action of the Bombay Government, advocate their retention in the service. The reason they adduce in support of this course is that these officials deserved promotion and had no other honest way to avoid supersession. This is no reason at all. On no ground whatever can officers who have purchased their places be relied upon to dispense justice. Another reason advanced is that the promise of indemnity offered by the Bombay Government must be kept intact at any cost. Woe be to the day when Mr. Ommanney promised to countenance corruption with a view to detect corruption! If the Bombay Government apprehend loss of honour and prestige in violating the promise, the Secretary of State for India and the Supreme Government should uphold the purity of the administration. Lord Reay has shown unmistakeable strength of character in bringing one of the highest officers of the Civil Service to trial for alleged corrupt practices, but he has unwillingly committed a legal and moral blunder which can on no account be defended. Under the guise of independent thought has crept in a moral servility which leads many among us to identify themselves with anything and everything which is not good in itself, but is accidentally connected with what is good. Lord Reay is a liberal and good Governor, therefore whatever he does is just and beneficial. If serious errors are committed by Lord

Reay, they are to be palliated or upheld, because they are the errors of one who is popularly respected. The synthetic mould of the Hindu mind is always prone to accept or to reject a thing in its entirety. The sifting business is a task very unpleasant to it.

The Bráhmans and the Government.

20. The Rájyabhakt (127), in its issue of the 19th March, refers to the complaint made by the Poona Vaibhav against Mr. Candy, Collector of Sholápur, for returning a Bráhman's application for a place with a remark that non-Bráhmans alone were to be given appointments, and thinks that Government officers like Mr. Candy do not know that it is very dangerous to follow in these days the policy of creating mutual dissensions among the various classes of the people by which policy India was conquered by the British, and observes that if the Bráhmans are to be removed from the Government service, an order to that effect should be issued! There are, says the paper, very few people as loyal and as clever in intrigues as the Bráhmans. There is a likelihood of great harm being done to Government by openly hating them. Such a policy on the part of Government is quite unbecoming. It is desirable that Government should call for an explanation from Mr. Candy. The Bráhman and all other sects should act peaceably and should manifest their strong disapproval of such conduct on the part of Government. [Writing on the same subject, the Poona Vaibhav (49), in its issue of the 17th March, asks :—What harm have the Bráhmans done to the English? Was it not the Bráhmans who surrendered their dominion to the English? Was not Nátu, who assisted the English in acquiring it, a Bráhman? Who helped Government in restoring order in the country? Who was it that assisted Government in bringing about a smooth administration of the country at the beginning? All this, quietly considered, shows that Government are much indebted to the Bráhman community. If then, forgetting these obligations, the officers of Government will make unfavourable remarks upon the Bráhmans, will it not appear that Government are very ungrateful? Surely it will not be wise for Government to show such ungratefulness, and we hope that they will see that such a patent mistake is not committed.]

Disapproval of the recommendation made by Mr. Hamilton, Third Presidency Magistrate, Bombay, to levy fees on criminal complaints at presidency towns.

21. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 17th March, says :—Even in these days of financial deficits, it is hard to welcome the present of Rs. 10,000 a year made by Mr. Hamilton, Third Presidency Magistrate, Bombay, to Government. Those who know the country best will perhaps least appreciate this decision and its confirmation by the Bombay High Court, which is to produce that rich result for the treasury. If the practice in the mofussil has been to charge fees for criminal complaints, that might be abolished rather than the exemption of the presidency towns therefrom. Justice in British India is costly and tardy enough from various causes; let not a further obstacle be raised at the very threshold of the courts. It would be offering a premium to the worst class of offenders and subjecting the meek and law-abiding aggrieved to further wrong. That is not a legitimate way to discourage frivolous complaints. If the work has increased, why not employ subordinate magistrates for the pettier portion and let the authors of frivolous complaints, after careful consideration, be fined? If the Magistrates have no power to do that, let them be invested with it. But, in the name of goodness, lighten the burdens on obtaining justice instead of adding to them. We have but limited faith in the dictum of the stamp revenue being made in the proper and prompt performance of the criminal work of this city "to serve the double purpose of increasing the revenue and decreasing the work with which the courts are flooded." This language has a somewhat suspicious resemblance to that conveying a beneficent principle on which the policy of a certain other department was based and has since been developed, viz., promise of the maximum of good and minimum of evil. At any rate, the principle is inapplicable to the case of criminal justice. The only legitimate means of repressing what requires repression is to fine the frivolous complainant, and not to levy a tax at the outset on him, much less on the aggrieved who has just cause for action.

22. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 21st March, says:—The annual administration report of the presidency presents the Native press with a brief summary of the progress of the Native States in this presidency, but that utterly fails to give us any correct idea of the real working of the machinery in them. Those Native States which publish their annual reports favour us with their copies, but that is only a one-sided version, and to arrive at a correct estimate of real progress made, the other side, i. e., copies of annual reports of Political Agents, are quite a necessity, but the Bombay Secretariat has hitherto declined to supply them. We do not know why this should be so. The local Government most disinterestedly places before the public press all its records, and when it has nothing to hide from the public gaze, we cannot see what should prevent it from supplying the press with copies of the Agencies' reports on the administration of the Native States. The Native press is much interested in the well-being and improvement of the Native States, and therefore has a right to know what the Political Agencies have to say on the subject. As in the matter of the Government publications so in that of the Agencies, the Government ought to exercise the same unrestricted freedom and keep every information about the States within easy reach of the press. We have no doubt that the Anglo-Indian press is supplied with these valuable documents and we see no reason why they should be withheld from the Native press. We hope that His Excellency Lord Reay will break through this mischievous policy of secrecy and allow outsiders a peep behind the curtain of the Political Agencies.

Necessity for supplying to the Native press copies of annual reports of Political Agents in Native States, and a suggestion to the Bombay Government in the matter.

23. In noticing the report on the administration of the A'bkári Department in the Bombay Presidency during 1887-88, the Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 20th March, says:—Mr. Dinsháh Edalji Váchha and Mr. Caine, M. P., have, in particular, shown by statistics and otherwise that intemperance has been on the increase in consequence of the ábkári policy of Government. The authorities do not believe that it is so, and had a nice opportunity to come forward with whatever proofs they had in support of their belief, but they have not availed themselves of it. It is, however, stated in the report that the A'bkári Commissioner intends to show hereafter the effect of the present policy on revenue and on the consumption of spirituous drinks, as he could not do this now in the absence of requisite information. Whatever Mr. Trevor may say on this point he will never be able to convince the public that the ábkári policy of Government has had no bad effect on the people, since it has arrived at the opinion after duly weighing arguments frequently advanced for and against the position. Mr. Caine has proved that though toddy contains less intoxicating element than beer, a larger tax is levied on it than on the latter. An attempt is made to contradict this assertion, with no better result than a battle of words. The statement in the report that the ábkári revenue has doubled itself since 1881 shows that the consumption of intoxicating drugs has increased, and indirectly proves the increase of intemperance. Country liquors have been made very dear, thereby giving encouragement to Europe drinks, in which, particularly in the cheaper sorts, adulterations are practised, to the great injury of the health of the consumer.

Comments on the Bombay A'bkári Administration Report for 1887-88.

24. The Gujaráti (78), in its issue of the 17th March, refers to the remark made by His Excellency Lord Reay in his speech at the laying of the foundation-stone of the Bái Motlánbái Wádia Obstetric Hospital, Bombay, that future donors should not only give the site and the building, but also an endowment to the institution which they may wish to found, and says that according to the proverb "Desires have no end," His Excellency has perhaps been tempted to make the remark in question, as Bái Motlánbái has given the site and the building for the hospital to be called after her. The paper does not think that Bái Motlánbái would have purchased at a great cost a site for the hospital, if the Parsonage, on which it is to be built, had not belonged to her, and adds that all donors have not their own sites, that the principle enunciated Public benefactions in Bombay and a remark made by His Excellency Lord Reay in connection with them at the laying of the foundation-stone of the Bái Motlánbái Obstetric Hospital.

by Lord Reay cannot therefore be generally applicable to all of them, and that if an attempt be made to burden future donors with all the cost of the institutions they may wish to found, their number will greatly decrease.

A request to the Bombay and the Gáikwádi Governments in connection with the free carriage of opium in their respective territories.

25. The Rájyabhakt (127), in its issue of the 19th March, complains of the hardship suffered by British and Gáikwádi subjects by their prosecution and heavy punishment for having with them even as little as $\frac{1}{8}$th tola of opium when entering the limits of the Gáikwádi and British territories respectively, and says that the Magistrates at A'mod, Ahmedabad, Dabhoi and other places have punished parties for this offence. Mr. Crawley-Boevey, while acting as Chief Presidency Magistrate, Bombay, ruled in a certain case that ten tolás of opium could be legally carried about by any person; the prohibition in question against the carriage of even $\frac{1}{8}$th of a tola of opium is therefore oppressive. This strict law is meant to prevent smuggling of opium produced in the Vijápur subdivision of His Highness the Gáikwád's territories, but even in Jeypur and other States in Márwád, where opium is produced and is sold cheaper than in British limits, two tolás are allowed. Persons who are in the habit of eating $\frac{1}{4}$th tola of opium per diem cannot be said to have smuggled the drug if they have one tola with them. The Girássiás in Káthiáwár eat four tolás at a time. Such persons as are ignorant of the law and go on a pilgrimage to some shrines in the Gáikwádi and British territories suffer annoyance unnecessarily. It would be well if travellers were allowed to go unmolested after confiscating the opium when they are found to be in possession of more than two tolás of the drug. The present practice is quite objectionable and must be improved. The Bombay and the Gáikwádi Governments ought to come to some reasonable arrangement in the matter.

Disapproval of the remarks made by the Indian Spectator about the attitude of Mr. Pritchard, Commissioner in Sind, towards Natives and their movements, while writing on his rumoured appointment to the Bombay Executive Council.

26. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 13th March, says:—Is Mr. Pritchard "believed to be strongly and openly anti-Native"? The Indian Spectator has only asserted the fact, but how the conclusion has been drawn is not stated. To speak strongly and openly against a high Government officer without sufficient warrant is to prejudice the British administration in the eyes of the public. What has our Commissioner done to deserve such a condemnation? His recent speech at Hyderabad shows, on the contrary, that he is very solicitous for the welfare of the people and that he is a friend of local self-government. It is believed in certain circles that he is not favourably inclined towards some popular political views. Is that the reason why he should be proclaimed as anti-Native? We are strongly against such a view of the matter being taken. Everyone knows that the present Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal is a great friend of the Natives. He promoted a certain public servant according to his seniority and merit, and he has now been given up because that public servant is unfortunately known to be against recent political developments. If our Commissioner is abandoned on the ground of political views, we certainly congratulate him on his release from an awkward connection not of his seeking. Does pro-Nativism mean Congressism? That is the Bengal interpretation of the term. Bombay should not adopt it, far less Sind. In another place the Phœnix quotes from the speech of Mr. Pritchard delivered at the Darbár recently held at Hyderabad and says:—We need not dwell any more on the speech of the Commissioner. It at once shows how anxious he is for the good government of the province over which he has been placed. The Indian Spectator has been very unfortunate in calling him anti-Native. Genuine love and not formulated opinion makes one friend. The speech itself, if not anything else, raises him to the status of a good governor.

Appointments of Messrs. Nugent and Monteath in the Bombay Secretariat as Chief and Acting Secretary to Government, respectively, justified.

27. With reference to the Indian Spectator's objection to Mr. Monteath's appointment as Acting Judicial Secretary and to the continuance of Mr. Nugent in the Secretariat, a correspondent, signing himself "S," writes in the issue of the Indian Spectator (1) of the 17th March as follows:—What new idea is this that has possessed you, Dear Spectator, about Secretariat reform? You object to

Mr. Monteath's appointment as Secretary in the Judicial Department, because you say his official experience has been confined to the Revenue Department, and you say that precisely the same objection can be raised to Mr. Nugent's holding the post of Chief Secretary in charge of the Revenue Department. But Mr. Monteath has had a varied experience, not only as an Assistant Collector and Magistrate, but also as an Assistant Judge and Sessions Judge, as officer on special duty in connection with the Kánara Land Assessment case, as Under Secretary in the Political, Judicial and Educational Departments, and last, though not least, as recognised by yourself, as Private Secretary to His Excellency the Governor. Mr. Nugent has served as Assistant Collector and Magistrate in Sátára, Thána, Surat, Poona and Kaira, as Assistant Educational Inspector in the Central Division, as Collector of Bombay, Sátára, and of Salt Revenue, in addition to service as Under Secretary and Secretary in the Political, Judicial and Educational Departments of the Secretariat. But apart from this, it must needs be remembered that there are few Englishmen in the service who are such honest, though unostentatious, friends of the Natives as Messrs. Monteath and Nugent are. How many Englishmen, high in office, in this country, can be pointed out who came forward before the Public Service Commission to say what Mr. Monteath said?—"I am of opinion that a claim made by a large number of Native gentlemen for a competition in India for the Civil Service simultaneously with competition in England is reasonable, and I can see no difficulty in the same question-papers being used at both examinations. I think it is an undoubted hardship that Native youths, who aspire to enter the Covenanted Civil Service of their own country, should be precluded from competing without the trouble and expense of a journey to England......The object of the [competitive] examination [in India and in England] should be to secure the best men, and there should be a fair field without any avoidable restrictions, all classes of Her Majesty's subjects who wish to compete being put as far as possible on the same terms." How many among our rulers were there who cordially took up Lord Ripon's scheme of local self-government, like Mr. Nugent, or who are there among them who have advocated the claims of educated Natives to employment, both in the mofussil and in the presidency town, as staunchly and steadfastly as he has done? Are there many members of the Civil Service who would have cared to face the storm of indignation of their own countrymen by allowing justice to take its course when Natives came forward to accuse one of their own body, and that one the Commissioner of a Division? Verily, if Englishmen were a subject-race in this country, they would never allow their appreciation of such friendship as these two officers have shown to be warped for a moment by such accidents as length of service in this or that department, but would rejoice in their continuance at head-quarters as good to themselves and deplore their severance from those head-quarters as an unmitigated evil.

Alleged misconduct of certain Government officers at Igatpuri.

28. A correspondent, writing from Násik to the Indu Prakásh (12) in its issue of the 18th March, says that he has heard of certain Government officers at Igatpuri outraging certain married women on the strength of their authority and by inducements of money, and of petitions having been made against them to their superiors, and expresses surprise that Natives should not give up their bad habits when they have before their eyes the late enquiry into the Crawford case and when they see that much is said against them.

Alleged behaviour of Mr. Lambert, 2nd Assistant Collector, Shikárpur, in a public library.

29. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 16th March, says:—The following account of an interesting incident that occurred in the Shikárpur reading-room and library reaches us. A young student had been reading a newspaper when Mr. Lambert came in. As Mr. Lambert did not wear any badge shewing his rank or position, but was ordinarily dressed like any other European, the student did not seem to take any notice of him, in other words, did not rise and salám him. Mr. Lambert, however, did not approve of this conduct, and catching hold of the student asked him if he knew who he was. The student replied "no." Thereupon Mr. Lambert began to impress upon the student that he (Mr. Lambert) was Sub-Divisional Magistrate and Assistant Collector, and that in future the student should always get up and salute him whenever and wherever he met him. But the student remained passively indifferent. And this proved too much for Mr. Lambert's temper. He got into a passion, took down the student's name and address, and asked him to leave the reading-room, which the student forthwith did for fear of worse results. We exceedingly regret that a good and able officer like Mr. Lambert should have so far forgotten himself in such a position. We are right glad for Mr. Lambert that he selected for his victim a man who had not the means nor inclination to call him to account for his strange behaviour. However, it will not be amiss to give Mr. Lambert a word of warning that any repetition of such liberty might be fraught with very serious results.

Approval of the appointment of Ráo Sáheb Vyankatráo Rukmángad to the Bombay Statutory Civil Service.

30. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 17th March, says:—We congratulate Ráo Sáheb Vyankatráo Rukmángad, B.A., LL.B., on his being nominated a member of the Statutory Civil Service. As we have more than once observed, if all the appointments to the Statutory Civil Service had been made on the same principle as has guided the Government in recent appointments, we should not have heard so much of the cry against this only door—back-door if you like to call it so—open to the natives of India to enter the charmed circle of reserved appointments. Of course, if a choice lay between open competition and selection we must give our vote in favour of the former, but where, as in the case of the present Civil Service Examination, the conditions are so hard as to shut out natives of India, we are forced to rest content with this back-door, trusting that the good sense of Government and the influence of popular opinion will make the most of the opportunity to deal justly by the children of the soil. His Excellency Lord Reay has shown that the right of selection need not necessarily be abused. In view of the recommendations made by the Public Service Commission, whereby the Statutory Civil Service will be abolished and a loss of some fifty places will be the result, one is disposed to look upon this compensatory arrangement with longing eyes. The gentleman selected this year is educated, cultured and of good birth, thus satisfying all the requirements insisted upon either by the Government or by the people. He belongs to the Inámdár family of Dhárwár, and is the nephew of that veteran leader of Dhárwár society, Ráo Bahádur Trimalráo Vyankatesh. We have no doubt that he will make a good Civilian officer.

Approval of the appointment of Ráo Sáheb Raghunáth S. Tipnis as District Judge of Ratnágiri.

31. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 17th March, says:—Ráo Sáheb Raghunáth S. Tipnis has been appointed to act as District Judge of Ratnágiri and it is needless to say that his appointment to such an important office will be received with pleasure all over the Deccan. He is one of our smartest and best educated men and deserves the rapid promotion he has received. We hope the present acting appointment will be the earnest of his being confirmed in it at no distant date. If such men are promoted, they are sure to do credit to the Government and to the Native community. The experiment of appointing natives of India to responsible posts is likely to have a fair trial in the Bombay Presidency. [The Kesari (39), in its issue of the 19th March, expresses the same sentiments.]

Mr. Dayárám Gidumal and his appointment as District Judge, Broach.

32. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 16th March, says:—We are glad to announce the appointment of Mr. Dayárám Gidumal as Judge and Sessions Judge of Broach. We hope this appointment will be a stepping stone to his transfer to one of the Sessions Judgeships of Sind where he is greatly wanted. We do not wish him to prematurely waste his energies on writing biographies of middle-aged men who have not yet run even half their course. But we sincerely desire him to return to his father-land, the field of his extensive past labours, and give fresh life and vigour to that reform association which is his pet child and which, though in full swing and good working order now, is yet wanting in that strength which his influence and sweet reasonableness alone can impart.

Mr. McIver's appointment as Superintendent of Police, Hyderabad.

33. The same newspaper says :—We cannot be sufficiently grateful to the Government of His Excellency Lord Reay for some of the most judicious and happy selections of officers in Sind. Mr. McIver, who stands third in the highest grade of his department and is one of the oldest and most experienced police officers, has been appointed Superintendent of Police, Hyderabad.

Renewal of arms licenses at Surat.

34. " A licensee" writes from Surat to the Rást Goftár (83) of the 17th March to complain of the delay and severity exercised by Mr. Crawley-Boevey, the Collector, and Mr. Gibbs, the Superintendent of Police, in the renewal of licenses for keeping arms in that town, says that they have deprived several respectable citizens of their licenses, and requests the Bombay Government, and specially the Commissioner, N. D., to order the two officers to relax their severity.

Vaccinators in the Kánara District and their superiors.

35. The Satyă Sudha (59), in its issue of the 18th March, says that all the vaccinators in the Kánara District are frequently fined and some of them are even dismissed from the service by their superiors for their supposed neglect in the discharge of their duties, disapproves of the conduct of the authorities in calling the vaccinators to their offices and asking them to tender their resignation without calling for an explanation from them as to the causes of their vaccinating only a small number of children, describes the difficulties met with by vaccinators in their work, absolves them of all blame in the matter, and remarks that, considering the unwillingness of the people in the district to get their children vaccinated, Government should first make vaccination compulsory in that district and then find fault with the vaccinators if the number of vaccinated children is found to be small, as it is at present.

The Sidis in Bombay and the necessity for the police having them prosecuted and severely punished.

36. The Yajdán Parast (143), in its issue of the 17th March, says that it is necessary that the Bombay police should take stringent measures to keep the Sidis (Abyssinians), who are a turbulent and fanatical class of people, under strong restraint. They fought, observes the paper, with the butchers during the last Moharram, created a riot in November last against the Boráhs, and made an attempt at rioting near the Sir Jamsetji Jijibhái Hospital on Monday last. The Sidis took a prominent part in the Bombay riot of 1874 against the Pársis. They frequently give trouble and appear to be puffed up by the leniency shown to them. They seem to think that the people and the police are afraid of them. They are not punished for the disturbances they create, but are, on the contrary, persuaded, patted and given feasts. Khán Bahádur Abdul Ali, head of the detective police, restored good feelings between the Sidis and the Boráhs after the November riot and persuaded the latter to give a feast to them. These savage Sidis are thus undeservedly fondled, and hence their readiness to create riots. The police ought to have them severely punished. Mr. Ryan, the Second Presidency Magistrate, has sentenced two Sidis, who took a leading part in the recent attempt at rioting near the Sir Jamsetji Hospital, only to 10 days' rigorous imprisonment each. The paper thinks the sentence to be inadequate, and says that flogging and long terms of imprisonment are necessary to bring the Sidis to their senses and to relieve the public and the police of a good deal of anxiety and trouble.

Proposal made by the Commissioner of Police, Bombay, for increasing the police force supported.

37. The Káside Mumbai (113), in its issue of the 18th March, supports the proposal said to have been made to Government by the Commissioner of Police, Bombay, for adding six European officers and 400 Natives to the present police force at a cost of Rs. 6,000 per mensem, and remarks that it is necessary that Government should sanction the proposal, and that they should not put forward retrenchment in expenditure as a pretext to decline to accord the sanction asked for.

Frequency of murders and assaults committed in Bombay and the alleged want of energy in the local police.

38. The Din Bandhu (7), in its issue of the 17th March, says :—Not a week passes but something happens to disturb the Bombay public. No sooner was Bombay surfeited with murders than the lesser crime of assault has commenced to fill up the minds of the people with anxiety for their safety. So soon after the fatal assault on a Boorood (basket-maker), we have to record another fatal assault by Sidis and their subsequent riotous behaviour. It is difficult to understand what the police are doing. It is rumoured that the Commissioner of Police has applied to Government to sanction an increase in the European police force. It may be that the increasing population of the town requires an addition to the police force, but in our opinion the remedy does not lie in that quarter. Latterly so many murders have been left undiscovered by the police that one is tempted to believe that they require rather a little goading to put a little fresh energy into them than any addition to their number. Some little wigging at times will teach the Police Superintendents and Inspectors that to their posts are attached grave responsibilities which they cannot well shirk, and that they must put forth more energy and zeal in the performance of their work.

The Holi festival in Bombay and the local police.

39. In writing about the Holi festival of the Hindus, the Gujaráti (78), in its issue of the 17th March, says that a very indecent scene is enacted every year in the Mandir of Chimanlálji Maháráj at Bombay during this festival and asks if the police cannot stop it. It adds that during the Holi a large number of people, good and bad, gather at night near the sea-shore and sing obscene songs so openly that gentlemen feel annoyed, that the local police do not stop the outrage, and that it seems that the police are to some extent purposely inactive in the matter. [A contributor to the Yajdán Parast (143) of the 17th March complains of mischief and the use of obscene language during the Holi continuing unchecked in Bombay, says that it is no wonder that it should be so when a large number of the police sepoys belong to the ignorant classes who indulge in this practice during the Holi, that the Commissioner of Police ought to give a strict warning to the force under him in this matter, and that it would be advantageous if the Commissioner were to suddenly go and see for himself whether the police officers do their duty properly in those Hindu quarters where obscene language is freely used during the festival.]

A gang of armed robbers in the Bhimthadi Táluka of the Poona District and suggestions to Government.

40. A correspondent, writing from Pátas to the Dnyán Prakásh (11) in its issue of the 21st March, says that a gang of twenty-five to thirty armed robbers has been prowling about in the táluka of Bhimthadi in the Poona District, and suggests to the authorities concerned that as the táluka has suffered much this year from want of rain and from bad crops, special measures should be taken to arrest the robbers and thereby to allay the anxiety of the people, some of the poor among whom might, in the event of the gang remaining undetected and unpunished, be tempted on account of their wretched condition to join it and to add to its strength.

PART II.—Legislation.

Government of India congratulated upon having opposed the extension of the English Factory Act to India.

41. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 21st March, says:—If there be any truth in what the Times of India says about the proposal for a new factory law for India, the Supreme Government may be congratulated on having set their face against the Manchester agitation in this matter. We are glad the Supreme Government have at last seen through this interested agitation, so long set in motion to put every possible restraint upon the development of our cotton industry. When the despatch of the Government of India on the subject is published we shall know what views Government hold as regards the question of female and boy labour. Nevertheless, it may, with some reason, be said that any summary curtailment of labour hours will affect prejudicially their interests, because the system of payment in many mills is by piece-work, the reduction of labour-hours means so much loss of wages. No doubt the case of children does require some consideration, but then there are difficulties about their keep and supervision when the parents are employed that must equally weigh with the authorities concerned when the question comes before them. And be it said to the credit of the local mill-owners that they are open to the consideration of all possible improvements, though they would not like to allow their own or their employés' interests to be sacrificed to the unnatural greed of Manchester. We are afraid lest the halting policy of Lord Cross in this matter might induce the Indian Government to go over to Manchester, but it is a matter for congratulation that Government have been timely blessed with the perception to see through the outward veneer of a pseudo-philanthropy for the people of India.

Comments on the Bombay Village Sanitation Bill.

42. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 17th March, writes:—We do not approve the idea of establishing sanitary committees and boards; but we uphold the principle as embodied in the Bombay Village Sanitation Bill, because, if we are not misinformed, these bodies will be small and workable,—in fact, of the nature we suggested in 1886. We suggest the method of gradual control and recommend that of a stringent kind in villages of the worst kind, because we find that Government is not prepared to adopt the suggestion of its sanitary advisers to educate public opinion before forcing an Act upon the people. Miss Nightingale, who has been anxiously watching the progress of this question, has lost no time in writing a letter reviewing the Bill, and we are glad that she has done so. The Bill as now drafted appears to be quite in keeping with the spirit in which Miss Nightingale has understood it. We fear that she is not quite on the right lines when she thinks that every village will be given an opportunity of doing what it can; then if it fails it will be warned, and then if it fails again the work will be done for it. As for us, we like to see the process reversed. There is no faith in sanitary reform of the kind the Sanitary Department advocates, and those amongst whom the work should be first commenced are steeped in ignorance. Work has therefore to be performed for them, and they have thus to be made to realise the value of reforms. Under these circumstances, in the hands of the District Collector the present Bill, when it takes the form of law, might be an engine of oppression. Dr. Hewlett was constantly hammering at this view of the matter, but in vain. Government has commenced at the wrong end, and we fear the results will be serious. If a commencement has to be made it must be made on the lines we suggest. District Collectors, howsoever mild and good-natured they may be, are a terror to the village people, and there is no provision made in the Bill to make it compulsory on the authorities to show that fullest opportunities were given to the village people to effect reform. Nor is there any guarantee that the best men in the village will be nominated to the committee. If the method, however, is reversed, as we suggest, the sting of the whole is removed at once. In places where the people are incapable of raising any voice against the Sáib Mábáp the work will all be benevolent and the people will at once be reconciled to the improvements. In the larger towns the people are made of a sterner stuff and will have the requisite stamina to fight for carrying out their own wishes. The method of transfer from class to class supplies the missing link Miss Nightingale refers to in paragraph 4 of her letter. She is of opinion that before voluntary sanitary reformers are subjected to the rule of a board under Part II, or before the constitution is changed from a board to a committee, a report from the Sanitary Department should be obtained. We too think that the fate of the village should not be made to hang on the report of one who has the least to do with sanitation. In paragraph 5 Miss Nightingale makes a valuable suggestion. She suggests that the village boards should be tacked to the rural boards already existing. We made the same suggestion in 1886 and we see no reason to change our opinion. In paragraph 6 she asks the following questions: (a) Would it not be well that the village rules to be made by the committee under Section 2 should be approved by the Sanitary Commissioner as well as by the Collector? (b) Should there not be some provision, by grant of lands or pay, to induce Mahárs and other hereditary village servants to settle in villages where their services are required? And if more is demanded of them, viz., to properly cleanse the villages, than was demanded of their forefathers must not more be paid to them? (c) What should be the status of the Sanitary Inspector (Sections 21 and 22)? Should he not be an educated man whose sanitary qualifications have been duly tested? Should he not belong to the Sanitary Department, his services being placed at the disposal of the Táluka Local Board? (d) Is the contract system (Section 26) such as you would approve, instead of having appointed village servants? With regard to the first question, we have to suggest that all rules should, in the first place, receive the sanction of Government. The idea of making the Collector a law-giver has certainly the charm of novelty, but we think a Collector is incapacitated for that sort of work. On the second question we have already given our opinion. On the third question we are strongly of opinion that the Inspector should be a qualified person and must be a servant of the Sanitary Department. We do not approve of the contract system, though that is often very useful and effective. The contract may contain a clause that the services of the village servants shall be engaged in preference to those of outsiders. In conclusion, we must thank the Government of Bombay for the earnestness it has shown in providing for village sanitation. We have also to thank Miss Nightingale for the philanthropic action she has taken in this matter.

43. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 18th March, writes:—About the general policy of the Bill there is one consideration which, we think, must not be lost sight of. It is very generous of the Government to wish to introduce self-government in our villages and other places, but the reform must be introduced with due regard to the capacities of the people who are to enjoy the privilege. An institution may be ever so good, but if the people who are to manage it have not the right capacity, the institution will be a clog on the people, and both the people and the institution will suffer. In the present instance the people of our villages should, by all means, be encouraged to accustom themselves to self-government, but the work must be thrown upon them gradually and tentatively. We think this warning in the case of the village sanitary boards is all the more necessary inasmuch as, in our opinion, the burden imposed upon the towns by the Local Boards and Municipal Acts is found by them in many cases to be insupportable, and the excessive strain put upon them threatens to make the experiment a failure. If the same catastrophe is to be prevented in the case of the sanitary boards, we think Government will do well to make the machinery of the boards as simple as possible.

Alleged refusal of Government to consider suggestions written in Maráthi about the Bombay Village Sanitation Bill commented upon.

44. The same newspaper says that it has received a letter from a correspondent in the Kolába District, strongly criticizing the conduct of Government in returning to the people of that district their suggestions in connection with the Bombay Village Sanitation Bill because they were written in Maráthi and were not accompanied by an English translation, and asking why the Government at all publish, if not for the use of people ignorant of English, translations in vernacular languages of the Bills that are brought before the Bombay Legislative Council, and remarks that if the fact is as it is stated above to be and if there be any rule requiring people to make suggestions only in English, the sooner it is abolished the better would it be for Government and the rayats.

PART III.—Railways.

Want of reserved first and second class accommodation for ladies on the B. G. J. P. Railway.

45. The Káthiáwár Times (82), in its issue of the 20th March, publishes a petition addressed to the Traffic Superintendent, B. G. J. P. Railway, by about 200 inhabitants of Junágad, complaining of the great inconvenience caused through want of reserved first and second class accommodation for ladies on the Junágad line, and says:—We do not understand why sufficient accommodation should not be provided on that line when Gondal and Bhávnagar divisions have it. We hope the Traffic Superintendent will give his prompt attention to this complaint and supply the want.

PART IV.—Municipalities.

Alleged insolent conduct of a Government officer towards his colleagues on the Surat Municipal Corporation.

46. A correspondent of the Gujaráti (78), in its issue of the 17th March, says:—The officer who made himself famous in the memorable meeting of the 31st January last by calling his fellow commissioners in the Surat Municipality beasts and liars seems determined to display his official personality in every meeting of the corporation. At the usual election general meeting of the Surat Municipality, this gentleman, because of his "pleasure" said he would not like to sit with another commissioner. This insult was meant for a Mahomedan (not one of the number of the much-maligned Vakils), a gentleman of high influence in the mercantile community, who once held the respectable post of Private Secretary to His Holiness the Mullánji of India. I simply admire the patience of the Mahomedan gentleman, who did not say a word in protest against the unprovoked conduct of the Government official. But I must draw the attention of the authorities to the conduct of this officer, whose insolence grows intolerable day by day, and it is my sad duty to request Government to take notice of it.

Municipal elections in Ránder, Surat District.

47. The Gujarát Darpan (76) of the 17th March hears that at the recent municipal elections in the town of Ránder, Mr. Ravishankar Jadurám, the polling officer, exercised undue pressure upon some of the voters, that the voting-boxes were opened before the scrutineers were appointed at a general meeting of the municipal commissioners, and that some of the candidates for election were allowed to see the voting papers, and remarks that if this information be true, the conduct of the polling officer is reprehensible. ["A rate-payer" writes from Ránder to the same paper of the 21st March, complaining that one of the candidates for election being allowed to inspect his voting-papers after the votes were counted at a special meeting of the municipality held for the purpose on the 15th instant, and requests the Collector of Surat to attend to the complaint.]

Khán Bahádur Nasarvánji Kharsetji recommended for the presidentship of the Ahmednagar Municipality.

48. The Nagar Samáchár (45) and the Nyáya Sindhu (47) of Ahmednagar, in their issues of the 16th and 18th March, respectively, describe the many useful services rendered to the public by Khán Bahádur Nasarvánji Kharsetji, who, they say, is both able and intelligent, and strongly recommend him for the presidentship of the local municipality. The Nagar Samáchár adds that Ráo Bahádur Shankar Pándurang Pandit is also an able and intelligent officer, but that he will not be able to properly discharge the duties of the president on account of his position and multifarious duties.

PART V.—Native States.

Alleged treasonable correspondence of His Highness the Mahárája of Kashmere and the British Government.

49. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 17th March, says:—Wonders will never cease. The world has not yet fully enjoyed the collapse of the Times over the infamous letters attributed to Mr. Parnell, M.P., when a story scarcely less incredible has turned up in India, according to which the Chief of an important State holds treasonable correspondence with some one not named, allows that correspondence to remain with a Diwán even after the latter is dismissed the service, according to which, again, the Diwán hands the papers to a European barrister for use in a collateral matter relating to himself, the lawyer moreover dies and leaves the papers to his widow, and she, not knowing their worth, sells them to some Native, who finds a purchaser for them in the Resident at the same Rájá's court. It is mere bathos compared to this story that at the same time a plot is discovered for poisoning the Resident's predecessor in office who is no more on the spot. Further the Rája at once admits the correspondence and offers to abdicate, but the Government is unwilling to press the matter hard. In all conscience, it is very wise at the present crisis through which the Native States of India are passing to adopt a policy of leniency and caution. But, soberly, is this story at all credible? We might answer it by asking whether, with the tales of Russian spies and their gold circulating among members of the Indian National Congress, such a story as the one indicated above is very wonderful? There is therefore room not so much for leniency for really existing treason as for extreme caution in accepting the story. Government would doubtless use that caution unstintedly; for the consequences of a mistake or an error in ascertaining the truth would be lamentable and far-reaching. The popular guess from the manner in which it is proposed to settle the immediate future of the State even before disposing of the charge would be that the Government wished for an excuse to take virtual charge of it, because of the frontier complications, while the non-official Anglo-Saxon has long wished to trot amidst the pastures of the Happy Valley freely. The former object has something in it, and it could be best gained by an open arrangement, but its effect on other Native Princes would be highly prejudicial; while the latter cannot be too strongly condemned. After this paragraph was written, we are told that even the Diwán knows nothing about the correspondence, and yet the Rája is anxious to be rid of all administrative work! This makes the story more mysterious than before and must whet the general curiosity to know the real truth, and as the motives of Government are also suspected, they are bound to publish the truth of the matter, whatever it be. In the middle of the week we had a long telegram purporting to give the other side of the matter. It is a relief to know, on the highest authority, that "the Government of India attach very little importance to the Kashmere letters." [Several other papers of the week have written similarly on the subject. They discredit the story about the discovery of treasonable letters, which they believe to have been forged either by Diwán Lachmandás or somebody else interested in the matter, and say that the whole thing may be the result of a conspiracy to dethrone His Highness the Mahárája of Kashmere and to annex his territories to the British Empire. Some approve of the rumoured plan of placing the State under a council of administration composed of three Europeans and one Native, viz., the Mahárája's brother Amarsing, but others say that the independence of the Native State will be preserved only in name, as the State will be virtually in the hands of Europeans, the single Native, Amarsing, being always in the minority and his voice counting for little.]

50. The Gujaráti (78), in its issue of the 17th March, says:—There has been another sharp attempt at annexing the Kashmere State. The very fact of Sir John Gorst telling in answer to a question in the House of Commons that the Government of India attach no special importance to the Kashmere letters is sufficient to prove that the Kashmere ruler has not been guilty of any treasonable acts, as alleged, and that the accusations preferred against him are based upon some forged documents which the political officers there have readily taken advantage of. It seems as if there was a plot carefully hatched against the Mahárája that has, fortunately for him, been frustrated; and has thus saved him the humiliation of being dethroned.

51. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 21st March, says:—The alleged treasonable Kashmere correspondence turns out to be a fiasco not worth the attention of respectable journalists and of a Government powerful as the British Indian Government. We believe Colonel Nesbit, who represents the Britannic majesty at the Jammu Darbár, must be the first to know the hollowness of the alleged treason, and could have afforded to suppress the currency of allegations which on the very face of them condemn the source, not only as unreliable but as most suspicious. The relations of the ex-Diwán to His Highness the Mahárája were well-known; that Mr. Plowden was not pulling on well with the Mahárája is also known; that the same or similar treasonable correspondence had cropped up at the time of the Ráwal Pindi Darbár; and that Government had just handsomely acknowledged the military assistance tendered to the British Government during the Black Mountain expedition; all these considerations should have stopped false rumours from finding place in newspaper columns, or at least a hint to that effect would have done the work. While this cloud of difficulties is being cleared away we hear of studied interference in the affairs of Kashmere by the imposition of a number of Civilians on that Administration and the transfer of the military command of the State's forces to a British officer—not a very graceful or justifiable epilogue to the handsome military services recently rendered by the Darbár. We know that Native administrations are defective, but the employment of European officers is not the right way to their improvement in Kashmere. The presence of a number of highly-educated Bengalis is reported to have given some tone to the administration, but somehow a clean sweep of them was a prelude to the difficulties of the Mahárája. If the improvement of Kashmere be at all under consideration, the best available Native agency is likely to achieve a task so well worthy of a politician of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's calibre.

52. In alluding to the contradictory reports received about the alleged treasonable practices on the part of His Highness the Mahárája of Kashmere, the Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 21st March, says:—On the one hand it is stated that the Mahárája on being confronted with the alleged treasonable correspondence made no attempt to deny the charges disclosed in it and proposed a scheme for his own abdication of the gádi, while, on the other hand, the Tribune, an influential Native newspaper of Lahore, asserts, under the alleged inspiration of the Mahárája himself, that the Chief has never confessed his supposed guilt, that the letters are forgeries disclosing a plot to threaten the Mahárája and to bring about certain changes in the administration, and that the part taken by Colonel Nesbit in connection with the matter has made him act harshly and unjustly towards the Mahárája. From these contradictory reports it is difficult to say what the truth is, and this state of things is likely to give rise to many more ugly rumours that would not be creditable to the Government of India. In the time of the father of the present Mahárája it was rumoured that on account of the Russian intrigues in Central Asia the Government of India had an eye on Kashmere on account of its contiguity to the frontier, and that the Indian Government either wanted to take possession of it or to place it in a position that would admit of certain arrangements being made in connection with it. These rumours were talked of for years together and were revived when the late Mahárája absented himself from the Darbár held at Ráwal Pindi, and certain Anglo-Indian newspapers denounced the Chief as disloyal and recommended the confiscation of the State. These reports continued to be talked about until the late Mahárája had an interview with Lord Dufferin at Lahore. It cannot be believed that the Indian Government has any designs against Kashmere, but unless an authoritative statement as to the existing state of things in regard to that State is put forth, the alleged khatpat now going on is likely to be connected with previous rumours and will give rise to more disquieting reports. If the Government of India is desirous of making certain arrangements in that State for furthering the Imperial interests, the same may be made after convincing the Mahárája and his subjects of their great importance and indispensability. [The Jáme Jamshed (109), in its issue of the 23rd March, also calls for an authoritative statement about the actual state of things in Kashmere.]

53. The Hindu Punch (31), in its issue of the 21st March, says:—There are signs of the Kashmere State, which is an eyesore to Englishmen, being overtaken by a calamity. The charges brought against the Mahárája appear to be trumped up like those brought against the late Malhár Ráo Gáikwád of Baroda. The Home Government has attached little importance to these charges. The very source from which the treasonable correspondence has been obtained is most suspicious. What a wonderful generosity and patience on the part of the British Government that it should attach little importance to a correspondence obtained from a most suspicious source! This is a political stratagem. One says that the Native Princes are rebels and murderers, and another shows his readiness to forgive them and to treat them kindly. The political schemes of the English are beyond conception. The conduct of British statesmen is considered by many to be like that of hungry and gluttonous beasts. Some hungry Anglo-Indian wolves are always searching India to find out a prey for the British Government. The writers in the Times of India, the Pioneer and the Englishman newspapers belong to this class of Anglo-Indians.

Duty of Government with regard to the allegations of the Amrit Bazar Patrika newspaper against Sir Lepel Griffin's conduct towards Her Highness the Begam of Bhopál.

54. The Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 21st March, invites the attention of Government to the writings of the Amrit Bazar Patrika newspaper anent the conduct of Sir Lepel Griffin towards the Begam of Bhopál, strongly urges that Government should order the trial of Sir Lepel with a view to have the whole truth brought to light, and remarks that Government ought not to forget the valuable assistance rendered by the State in the year 1857 and to neglect to enquire into the conduct of its political officers, as such forgetfulness and omission are likely to bring on sore evils in their wake.

The people and the Native States of Káthiáwár and a petition prepared by the editor and proprietor of the Rájyabhakt newspaper to His Excellency Lord Reay on their behalf.

55. The Rájyabhakt (127), in its issue of the 19th March, publishes a further instalment of the petition which its editor and proprietor has prepared for presentation to His Excellency Lord Reay on behalf of the people and Native Princes of Káthiáwár, attacks and exposes Mr. Vithaldás, the present Kárbhári of Bhávnagar, and adds that Lord Reay will be able to form an opinion of the condition of the subjects of the Bhávnagar State and of the justice they receive.

Disapproval of the transfer to the British Government of the Postal Department of the Mysore State.

56. The Havyak Subodh (146), in its issue of the 19th March, disapproves of the transfer of the Postal Department of the Mysore State to the British Government, and says:—Mr. K. Sheshádri Ayar, the Diwán of Mysore, who has been granted an extension of service as well as an addition of Rs. 2,000 to his salary and a title by the British Government, might have given the Postal Department to them as a return for the boons that he has received at their hands. He ought to have thoroughly considered the matter before consenting to the transfer.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

The Secretary of State for India charged with misrepresenting facts to Parliament.

1. The Rást Goftár (83), in its issue of the 24th March, writes:—The silence of Lord Salisbury and his colleagues may be excused, but there can be no excuse whatever for the absurd reply which the India Office, as usual, contrived that the Under-Secretary should read in response to Mr. Bradlaugh's question regarding the omission of India from the recent Queen's speech. India is so wonderfully prosperous and withal so contented—thanks to the happy reign of law, order, and what not, established by the retired Viceroy—that there is absolutely nothing which requires any special attention of the House of Commons, and much less of Her Majesty's Ministers! If that veracious official had condescended to enlighten the House on the circumstances of the unbounded prosperity to which he referred, he might have done a valuable service to India. But, in the absence of a corroborative statement, such a declaration only provokes contempt. That a responsible officer of State should resort, when driven to bay, to so glaring a mis-statement is indeed a misfortune. We, Indians, must be very cautious how in future we place any confidence in official utterances of the nature expressed by Sir John Gorst. It is, indeed, a most deplorable fact that there has been so much of official demoralization since the assumption of office by the present Ministry. There has been no limit to the misleading statements it has put forth year after year in reply to Indian questions asked by honourable members in both Houses of Parliament. So much has this evil been on the increase that we were constrained to take serious notice of it some months ago. The fact is that it has now become a daily practice with the Secretary and the Under Secretary of State for India to distort and misrepresent contemporary history. Look at the absolutely hollow declaration made by Lord Cross the other day that the revenue which Government derived from excise was a secondary consideration, and that the first consideration which earnestly engaged its attention was the promotion of the habit of temperance! Is there a single unbiassed individual in the country who believes in this legend, so audaciously retailed in the House of Peers, except the frenzied partisans and blind supporters of the ábkári policy of the Government of India? Then just examine the reply of Sir John Gorst to the query of Mr. Bradlaugh, M.P., about the affairs in Sikkim. Those who have intelligently followed the affairs of Thibet during the last three years are not required to be reminded that the people of Sikkim did not begin the quarrel till the diplomacy of the Simla Foreign Office, by its pretentious commercial and scientific mission, alarmed the secluded but peaceful people who had just heard of the forcible acquisition of the kingdom of the ill-starred Theebaw. Sir John Gorst ignored the mischief of that implied aggressive enterprise, and tried to foist on the Sikkim people the reason of the present armed interference on the part of the Indian Government. As a matter of fact, Sikkim was long on the defensive. Any border-people would do the same when threatened by a powerful neighbour. But an original act of self-defence was allowed to be misrepresented; then an armed force was sent; and when the weak force was dislodged, Government claimed victory and pointed it out as an act of retributive justice. Thus did the wolf affect the lamb. And thus did Sir John Gorst attempt to enlighten the representatives of the British electors about the Thibet affairs! Is contemporary Indian history to be allowed to be thus manufactured? Is there to be no protest from India? [The Indian Spectator (1) of the same date also finds fault with Sir John Gorst for having stated that the prosperity enjoyed by India had precluded any allusion to her in the recent speech from the Throne.]

Stock arguments of Indian patriots contradicted.

2. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 20th March, says:—There are two stock arguments which are generally used by Indian patriots when they like to show the British Indian rule to disadvantage by contrasting it with the Mahomedan rule. The first is that during the Mahomedan régime Natives were offered the highest posts in the kingdom, while during the so-called liberal British Government Natives are not allowed to raise up their heads at all. Really this sounds very plausible, but it is fallacious. The highest posts during the Mahomedan period were made and unmade by a breath of the emperor or governor. It was only a matter of favour. We ask is it so now? Can the Governor-General or the Secretary of State for India dismiss the Honourable Mr. Justice Nánábhái or the Honourable Mr. Justice Mitter at his will without enquiry and trial even if they were guilty? Which should we prefer now, prime ministership depending only on whimsical favour, or any post, however low, based upon right? Certainly the latter. The second argument, which is more plausible but more fallacious, used by Mr. Dádábhái Navroji in his speech at Newcastle is that the Mahomedans came and settled here, so that the money which they earned remained in India, while the English come and go and drain off from India a huge sum in shape of salary and pension amounting to, it has been calculated, three krors of rupees annually. How far the amount stated is true we cannot say, but that a large sum is taken away is a fact. But should we not consider the return which we get side by side with this apparent drain? The first return is the safety of life and property, which is the basis of all prosperity. The second return is the enormous Indian investment by English capitalists, before which three krors of rupees sink into insignificance and which will be withdrawn the moment the British administration is withdrawn. Who will grudge to purchase safety of life and property, railways and mills, prosperous commerce and brisk trade, with the paltry sum of three krors of rupees? No one, except perhaps the patriot who must supersede the foreign agency at any cost.

British Indian subjects in Zanzibar and compensation for the losses sustained by them.

3. The Gujarát Darpan (76), in its issue of the 24th March, says:—Sir James Fergusson recently declared in the House of Commons that no compensation is to be demanded from Germany for the losses sustained by the Indian British subjects trading in Zanzibar. These Indian merchants have suffered great losses, and many valuable lives have been lost by the depredations of the Germans. But they are Indians, no matter if they live under the British flag. It is impossible to offend Prince Bismark for their sake. Moreover, England was to an extent a loud consenter to the events that have happened, because she tries hard to be under the good graces of the German Chancellor. But, just for a moment, suppose Englishmen in the position of these injured Indians, Germany to be Portugal or a State not powerful, and imagine what happens. Then the British flag is insulted, and an unnatural and cowardly attack is made on Englishmen, freemen everywhere. Thus does John Bull think at the time. This is an unpleasant and unrelishable truth, no doubt, but to illustrate the difference between a dominant and a subject race it would do.

Death of Mr. John Bright, M.P., deeply regretted.

4. The Bombay Samáchár (92) and the Jáme Jamshed (109), in their respective issues of the 29th March, record with deep regret the death of Mr. John Bright, M.P., and observe that the sad news has been received throughout India with heartfelt sorrow, and that the people of this country will always remember with feelings of deep gratitude the valuable services rendered by the deceased to the country for a long period that commenced when there were in and out of Parliament very few advocates to plead her cause.

Financial Statement for 1889-90 criticised.

5. In giving a summary of the results of the financial statement for 1889-90, the Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 29th March, says:—The chances of a great war, a great famine and a further fall in exchange leave the results in an uncertain condition, nobody knowing when any or all of these calamities might befal. It is gratifying that the Government of India are aware of this position, but the budget gives no information as to whether any, and if so what, precautions are to be taken against the impending contingencies. On the other hand, every year new sources of revenue are devised and the receipts are increased and the expenditure is also augmented so as to show a deficit in every budget. If the present financial policy continues, the prospect would be most dismal in case of the occurrence of any of the three impending calamities mentioned above; and as time elapses their presence would find the people financially more weak than before. It is, therefore, to be hoped that proper measures will be at once taken to fortify and improve the financial position of the country.

In writing on the same subject, the Jáme Jamshed (109), in its issue of the same date, observes :—The budget is not a promising forecast, but ought to be hailed with delight, simply because it does not announce the imposition of a new tax. The prosecution of military defence works during the year has, in addition to taking up the balance of six lákhs of rupees, caused a deficit of two lákhs. This is a repetition of the mistake of extravagant expenditure in a single year, committed hitherto, and it is to be hoped that the same will not be the case hereafter. The heavy military expenditure in Burma ought to be met by raising new Burmese loans and not by throwing the burden on the Indian treasury. The decline in the salt revenue has proceeded from no other cause than the heaviness of the salt-duty, as has been admitted even by the Secretary of State for India. The public has been fully convinced that the present ábkári policy has increased the revenue as well as the consumption of liquor, and this conviction cannot be shaken by the version given by the Finance Minister. The present unsatisfactory condition of the finances can be remedied only when the present heavy military expenditure is duly curtailed and with the exception of some of the highest offices the Indian services are freely thrown open to the Natives on salaries much lower than are paid to Europeans at the present day.

The proposed reform of the Indian Legislative Councils deemed necessary.

6. The Bakul (22), in its issue of the 24th March, says :—It is much to be regretted that the suggestions submitted by Lord Dufferin to the Secretary of State for India for the expansion of the Legislative Councils of this country should not have commended themselves to Lord Cross. The right of interpellation, says Lord Cross, if given to the Legislative Councils of India, would introduce an element of obstruction in the discussion of financial questions, which in the present critical state of the Indian exchequer it is not desirable to encourage. To this we say that India and her finances being in the opinion of many English politicians in a prosperous state, why should Government be afraid of bringing financial questions for discussion before the Legislative Councils ? Why should it fear the light of discussion, if everything is sound ? The truth is that the Indian exchequer is rotten to the core. The military expenditure of the empire is increasing daily, and although the revenues are augmented by means of the salt-duty and other objectionable taxes, they cannot keep pace with the ever-increasing debit side. This extravagance must be checked, but our autocratic rulers are unwilling to do so. This is the only possible explanation of Lord Cross's refusal to grant us the rights advocated by our late Viceroy. We hear that His Excellency Lord Lansdowne is of the same opinion as Lord Cross. If it be so, the new Viceroy has formed an opinion on this question too early. He has yet seen very little of India and has not yet made himself thoroughly acquainted with the past and the present condition of the country. We cannot believe that a ruler who has made himself popular in an independent country like Canada can be capable of such narrow-mindedness.

Earl of Dufferin's proposals for the reconstitution of the Legislative Councils disapproved.

7. In giving the substance of the Earl of Dufferin's proposals for the reconstitution of the Indian Legislative Councils, the Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 26th March, says that the proposals make certain concessions on the one hand, and, on the other, put forward reservations that nullify the boon. It is, however, glad that the higher authorities have seen it necessary to admit the necessity for reforming the Councils.

The confidential circular of the Government of India prohibiting Government servants from raising subscriptions for the promotion of any political purpose commented upon.

8. The Rást Goftár (83), in its issue of the 24th March, says :—The circular, now no longer " confidential," addressed by the Government of India to all the public servants throughout the country has called forth much indignation from the Native press of Bengal. We see nothing objectionable in it. It appears to the Government inexpedient that officials should interest themselves in raising subscriptions for the promotion of any political purpose, and therefore orders have been issued that Government servants should hold aloof from identifying themselves in this manner with any political cause.

The Indian National Congress is obviously the movement which is in the mind of the Government. But whether they are aiming at that particular propaganda or not, we cannot question the propriety of the principle involved in the edict that officials should take no active part in a political movement, because their action is liable to misconstruction and misapprehension, and because zeal in a popular cause may lead in some cases to an abuse of power. When His Highness the Nizám gave a donation to the Patriotic Association, it was pointed out that the Princes of India should abstain from taking sides in politics, and the reasons which may be given in favour of this view are to some extent applicable to the case of Government officials. A movement intended to give voice to the political aspirations of the people is not necessarily antagonistic to Government; and therefore we hope that the circular of the Supreme Government does not originate in a narrow desire to stifle those aspirations, but is purely based upon considerations of expediency as well as of discipline and subordination in the ranks of the public service. [The Gujarát Mitrá (79) of the 24th and the Káside Mumbai (113) of the 25th March approve of the circular in question, and say that Government servants should also be prevented from raising funds for the presentation of addresses. The Gujaráti (78) of the 24th and the Gujarát Gazette (77) of the 28th March disapprove of the confidential circular, as they think that it is directed against the Indian National Congress movement, and remark that the expectations formed by the people of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne do not seem likely to be fulfilled.]

9. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 24th March, says:—The Government of India has done well in prohibiting Government servants from taking part or having any connection with or giving any help to any political association. It is very desirable that political activity should grow up in India without the help of Government officials. Political movements, if they are to be of any use and stability, should be spontaneous, and on this principle the action of the Government of India is very commendable. We learn from the Bombay Gazette that some of the Native Princes were privately requested by some Government officers to join the Patriotic Association established by Sir Syed Ahmed in opposition to the Indian National Congress. But the Government of India, when it heard of this indiscretion on the part of its servants, pointed out the impropriety of their act. If this be true, the action of Government in this matter deserves every praise. But we are also informed that in some places the Congress movement was much hampered by some bureaucrats. What we wish the Government to do is that since it has issued a circular prohibiting its servants from giving any help to any political movement, it should also issue a circular ordering them not to take any measure, which may, directly or indirectly, affect the interests of the Congress. The intentions of Government will not then be liable to mis-interpretation and the mischievous notion that Government does not look with a favourable eye upon this national movement will be dispelled. [The Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 25th March, refers to the same circular, and says that no sensible person will find fault with Government for preventing their officers from taking any part in the collection of subscriptions for political movements of any kind whatever, but it does not understand the meaning of the order which the Bombay Gazette says the Government have issued to the Native Princes, asking them not to help either the advocates or the opponents of any political movement in India. The paper is of opinion that Government had no reason to restrain the independence of the Native Princes, who should have been left at liberty to aid the Indian National Congress or the Patriotic Association of Sir Syed Ahmed just as they liked.]

Modes of collecting subscriptions for the Indian National Congress suggested.

10. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 24th March, says that in order that the Indian National Congress should be a real national movement, a committee should be formed every year at every chief town at which its meeting is to be held, for the purpose of making arrangements to establish its branches in every district and táluka town with a view to collect subscriptions for it. The paper adds that if all persons, excepting those who are opposed to the Congress, were to contribute a pie each towards it the amount would come up to a lákh of rupees, and that if the money were collected in this manner it would tend to make the masses take an interest in the movement—a thing most desirable for its success.

Mr. Mackenzie's appointment to the Under-Secretaryship of the Supreme Government expected to do an amount of good to the Bombay Presidency.

11. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 28th March, says:—We hail with delight the appointment of Mr. J. W. Mackenzie, Bombay Civil Service, to the Agricultural Under-Secretaryship of the Government of India. It is but rare that Bombay Civilians get entrance into the departments of the Supreme Government wherein their presence is expected to do more good to our presidency. Of course in such positions a conscientious, independent and experienced person who can well represent and bring to bear his knowledge upon any important question from our side is needed, and such person we find in Mr. Mackenzie, who has now been transferred to a sphere whence he can do an amount of indirect good to this presidency. Two very important questions—the question of land assessments and that of the agriculturists' relief—must engage the attention of the local authorities sooner or later, and when the questions come to be placed before the Supreme Government for final disposal, Mr. Mackenzie's Bombay experience will be of great use in arriving at a mature decision.

12. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 25th March, writes:—In a case pending in appeal before the Original Side of the Bombay High Court certain facts are disclosed which show that the highest British officers are occasionally not incapable of conduct which they would be the first and loudest to condemn in others. The case comes before the Court out of a partnership dispute. The particular facts of the dispute are sub-judice and we have nothing to say about them. But the disclosures we refer to are incidental, and we think the public is interested in knowing them. When the appeal was argued in the Appellate Court, one of the learned Judges, we are told, remarked that the affair was a job, and any impartial critic will not fail to endorse that judgment. Our surprise is that such a job should have been perpetrated under the very nose of the Government, and not a whisper about it should have been heard by the public but for this adventitious dispute between the persons who have profited by the transaction. We regret the jobbery all the more, because one such act is enough to bring the good name of British justice into disrepute. There is nothing for which British rule is more distinguished and of which it is more proud than for its absolute impartiality and uprightness. The boast of British justice is usually well-deserved, but it is to be regretted that even a single instance should occur to mar the boast. A plain statement of the case, as far as it can be gathered from the correspondence, is enough to show how the name of the British Government is compromised by the act we speak of. Early in 1885, that is, in the closing days of Sir James Fergusson's régime, an extensive plot of salt land near Bhyndar on the Bassein creek was proposed to be set apart for the production of salt by the Salt Department. In such a case the usual practice of the department seems to be to advertise for tenders from persons who would take up the land, construct salt-works and produce salt on certain conditions. When the land in question was advertised, thirty-four different applicants sought to take up the land on terms more or less profitable to Government, and it seems the Salt Department set great store on the investment. Among these applicants was one Háji Bákar valad Shaikh Sáheb Fakir, a salt merchant of Bhiwndi, who strove hard to obtain the land. He made various applications under various aliases and through different persons, but found the Salt Department inexorable. He now turned his efforts in another direction. He got hold of Shaikh Abdul Gaffur, head butler on the Government House establishment, showed him how profitable a concern the salt-works would be, and induced him to work to obtain the land. The head butler now set about his business, and he was apparently backed up by some of the officers on the Governor's staff in his project. Instead of going to the Salt Department they go direct to the Collector of Thána, and their intercession, charged with the force of the Government House, induced the Collector to make apparently a free gift of the land to Shaikh Abdul Gaffur. The officers of the Salt Department found themselves non-plussed by the action of the Collector, but they too feel the power in the background and give a grudging acquiescence. One officer only is found strong enough to protest against the arbitrary proceeding. Mr. Moore, the then Commissioner of Customs, Salt, Opium and Abkári, is unable to quietly acquiesce in the arrangement, and he gives vent to his dismay in unmistakeable terms. He wrote to Mr. Trevor, the Collector of Salt Revenue, under date the 7th October 1885. Mr. Moore does not stop here. He writes to the Government asking the grant of the land to Abdul Gaffur to be cancelled. He wishes the Salt Department to be left free to choose the most deserving of the applicants and proposes, apparently by way of a compromise, to give one of the plots to Abdul Gaffur and to lay out the remaining three plots more profitably. This sensible request is disallowed by Government. After this resolution of Government Mr. Moore probably finds himself powerless to resist. He accepts the inevitable and grants the license, and the concern is started as Abdul Gaffur Salt-Works. It is noteworthy that in this matter, while Abdul Gaffur as the proprietor gets the largest benefit, there are at least two other members of the establishment at Government House who are also gainers. Mr. D. F. Leao, clerk to the Private Secretary to the Governor, and Shaikh Amir, Apothecary, Government House, get three shares each in the concern. The meetings of the share-holders are held at Government House, and all the proceedings take place under, so to say, the nose of the Government. The above story tells its own tale. Any comment is superfluous. It is scarcely necessary to point out how demoralizing the action of the Government may prove to be. If the Governor's butler is to get for the asking a free gift of 325 and odd acres of land for the valuable services he has rendered to Government, have not the butlers of each of the Collectors and the Divisional Commissioners a like claim upon their respective masters? How would Government relish a like gift by a Mámlatdár to his faithful servants? The most surprising part of the transaction is that Government sticks to it even when one of its highest officers protests against it and exposes its true character. The officer gets a snub for his pains and the Governor's faithful servant is left secure in his possession. Such is the tale—we leave the reader to draw the moral.

The Crawford case and the advisability of prosecuting the London Times, the Times of India, and other newspapers that have commented upon it while it was sub-judice.

13. The Hitechchhu (80) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 28th March, disapproves of the conduct of Mr. Crawford's friends in needlessly attacking His Excellency Lord Reay and in commenting upon the Crawford case while it is sub-judice, and remarks that if a Native public writer had commented upon a similar case under similar conditions the court would certainly have taken notice of it. The High Court of Calcutta had, observes the paper, the editor of a Native newspaper of that town punished for commenting upon a case while it was sub-judice. Why is then no notice taken of the London Times, the Times of India and other newspapers that have written about the Crawford case?

The conduct of the St. James's Gazette and the London Times in connection with the Crawford case condemned.

14. The Chandánshu (24), in its issue of the 24th March, says:—The St. James's Gazette and the London Times have taken up the side of Mr. Crawford and in their eyes he is innocent. They are welcome to form this opinion. We only wish to point out that the Government of Bombay must necessarily have more opportunities to form a correct opinion about Mr. Crawford than these papers can possibly have. The Times and others insinuate that His Excellency Lord Reay has got up this case against Mr. Crawford to satisfy a private grudge. This supposition, however, does not stand to reason. Lord Reay may have a private grudge against Mr. Crawford. But what of Lord Reay's predecessors in office? Had they also their private grudges against him? Sir Philip Wodehouse would have been glad if Mr. Crawford had taken service in some other province. Sir Richard Temple thought it necessary to keep a watchful eye on him. Sir James Fergusson was informed by a commission of Civil Servants that Mr. Crawford's conduct was suspicious. This to our mind appears to be an incontestable evidence against Mr. Crawford. If in the face of such unanimous opinion of three Bombay Governors the Times and others still persist in believing in the conspiracy theory, then the only explanation possible is that all of them are blinded by false pride. We respectfully urge on Government that the assurances given to witnesses in the Crawford case should be upheld and that the Mámlatdárs who volunteered evidence should be restored to their places although they are partially guilty. We commend for the consideration of Government the ruling made by the House of Commons in the case of Lord Macclesfield in 1725.

The London Times, its advocacy of Mr. Crawford's case and its attack on His Excellency Lord Reay's Government condemned.

15. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 24th March, quotes the opinions of the Daily Telegraph, the Daily News and the Pall Mall Gazette about the Times after the collapse of its case against Mr. Parnell, M.P., and says :—We make these brief extracts only to show that a journal which could go so far astray in a matter near its very door cannot be trusted to act more wisely in one the truth of which lies thousands of miles away and must get more or less mutilated through transmitting agencies. What was it that misled the Times so egregiously in this Irish business? The prejudice and the interests of political partizanship is the reply. But in the Crawford case these blinding causes are still further reinforced by differences of race and creed, and if this is remembered, the danger to truth and fairness which the Times' treatment of the case implies and the worthlessness of its hostile criticism of the Government of His Excellency Lord Reay in regard to their conduct therein, ought to become patent to the meanest capacity, and clear as noonday even to a tolerably honest-minded partizan. It is to be hoped, therefore, that the English public will no longer be led away by what this once great journal says, not only on the case in point, but on all Indian questions involving a conflict between Indian and Anglo-Indian or English prejudices and interests.

Prosecution of the self-incriminated Mámlatdárs disapproved.

16. The Dnyán Ságar (28), in its issue of the 25th March, says that it is surprised that Government should be prepared to prosecute the Mámlatdárs who have admitted in their evidence in the Crawford case to have bought their offices, since the Mámlatdárs came forward to give evidence and told the truth after they were assured by Government that no harm would be done to them if they told the truth, and that Government need not incur the expense and trouble of a fresh judicial trial, as the Mámlatdárs have already incriminated themselves in their evidence on oath in the Crawford case. and can therefore be at once deported to the Andamans on the strength of their former depositions. The paper further asks the people to take a lesson from the conduct of Government towards these Mámlatdárs and points out the hollowness of the promises given by the authorities.

Alleged connection of the departure of Mr. Lee-Warner to England on leave with the consideration of the report of the Crawford Commission by the Secretary of State for India.

17. The Maháráshtră Mitră (43), in its issue of the 28th March, says :—The papers in the case of Mr. Crawford have reached the hands of Lord Cross and we are informed that His Lordship is favourably disposed towards Mr. Crawford. But Mr. Lee-Warner has just gone to England and we are anxiously waiting to see what new aspect the case assumes. It is rumoured that Mr. Lee-Warner has taken leave and gone home because His Excellency Lord Reay and himself could not pull on well. Another rumour is that Lord Reay has specially deputed Mr. Lee-Warner to explain the intricacies of the Crawford case to the Secretary of State for India. It is also in the air that Mr. Lee-Warner has gone to England to show Lord Cross the papers in the Akalkot, Jath and Janjira cases against Mr. Crawford, His Lordship having intimated that permission to proceed in these cases would be given only after personally seeing all the papers. We cannot believe in any of these rumours as we have no information either way. We are only cognisant of the fact that Mr. Lee-Warner was very busy collecting information about these cases till the eve of his departure to England.

The Crawford case and the telegram sent by the Honourable Mr. Telang to the London Times in connection therewith.

18. The Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 28th March, writes :—Towards the end of last month the Honourable K. T. Telang, C.I.E., of the Bombay Legislative Council, wired to the London Times through Mr. W. Digby, C.I.E., Agent in England of the Indian National Congress, a protest against the alleged attempts made by that journal and its Calcutta correspondent "to prejudice English opinion against the Bombay Government in respect of the Crawford case and the Native Magistrates." We strongly doubt whether Mr. Telang was well advised in "telegraphing" his "brief temperate protest against hasty judgment on ex-parte statements, and on insufficient information respecting a highly important matter," and also whether it will answer the purpose it was intended to serve. We for our part are rather inclined to think that it will produce precisely the opposite effect. It is not at all unlikely that Mr. Telang's protest may be regarded as an attempt to prejudice English opinion against Mr. Arthur Crawford, because it was telegraphed about a week before the transmission of the Commission's report with the observations of the Bombay Government thereon to the Secretary of State for India. The Bombay Government had their own way, and instituted a Commission under Act XXXVII of 1850. Twenty-four cases of corruption were "fully" gone into, and the proceedings are before the public. It is also known that the Commission has acquitted Mr. Crawford. And yet we are cautioned against forming "hasty judgment on ex-parte statements and on insufficient information respecting a highly important matter." But it would seem that what the public is asked to do is to hold its judgment in suspense, until information in the possession of the Bombay Government—some indefinite information not subjected to judicial investigation and collected behind the back of the officer concerned, and ex-parte in the strictest sense of the term because the officer concerned has not had an opportunity even to rebut it—is laid before the Secretary of State for India and is considered by him along with the report of the Commission. If this be the real meaning of the caveat entered by Mr. Telang and Mr. Digby, all we can say is that all fair-minded men cannot but be startled at such a proposal. We have so much confidence in Mr. Telang's fair-mindedness that he himself will be startled at his own caveat, when divested of the verbiage and apparent fairness in which it is involved. We are quite willing to be set right if we have done any unconscious injustice to Mr. Telang. And nothing will give us greater pleasure than to be assured that Mr. Telang's caveat does not bear the construction we have put upon it. The caveat, when construed in the light in which we have construed it, involves a very dangerous principle, namely, that an officer, who after a "full" inquiry into all the allegations urged against him by a competent Commission under Act XXXVII of 1850, has been acquitted, can yet be condemned on the strength of allegations, not subjected to judicial test provided by the said enactment, but only inquired into by the officers in charge of the prosecution and also by the Executive Government. "The Hermit in the Mofussil" and "D. M.," both of whom are evidently European officers of the Bombay Civil Service and both of whom write to the Bombay Gazette about the widely talked of corrupt practices of Mr. Crawford, express their surprise at his acquittal by the Commission. But we should like to know if any of them would like the foregoing procedure to be applied in their own case if any misconduct is imputed to them, or if they would like any of their brother officers to be subjected to the same procedure. We dare say that one and all of them would strongly object to the procedure under such circumstances. If our inference be correct, then all information not subjected to judicial investigation, which the Bombay Government may have had in their possession when considering the Commission's report, is practically useless and has no bearing on the question at issue. [The Arunodaya (20) of the 24th March, while writing on the same subject, observes that the very fact that the Honourable Mr. Telang has approved of the conduct of the Bombay Government, which has acted most courageously and straightforwardly from the beginning of the Crawford case, shows that the Government does not deserve any blame in the matter, and that the Honourable Mr. Telang deserves praise for his attempt to prevent English opinion being prejudiced against the Bombay Government in the Crawford case. The Kaiser-i-Hind (112) and the Yajdán Parast (143) of the 24th March also approve of the Honourable Mr. Telang's action in the matter and praise him for it.]

The contemplated transfer of charitable dispensaries to municipal corporations disapproved.

19. The Poona Vaibhav (49), in its issue of the 24th March, says that Government now think of getting rid of a good many dispensaries by transferring the burden of their maintenance to the municipalities. It disapproves of the contemplated economy and ironically remarks that charitable dispensaries afford indeed a very safe field for retrenchment, because the people affected by their abolition are poor and unrepresented, and that Government are not afraid of any criticism from that quarter.

Proposed rules in regard to Government servants whose services have been lent to Native States, municipalities, &c., commented upon.

20. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 24th March, writes:—The Government of India has recently issued a resolution regarding its servants transferred or to be transferred to foreign service. Government is, no doubt, within its rights in reviewing its whole position with respect to its servants lent to Native States, municipalities, &c. It does not exceed its authority in altering old rules on the subject. But in one part of the resolution, the Government states that it sees no reason why old officers in foreign service may not be called upon to pay at the new-levied higher rate for the past period of their services. In fact, it intends or contemplates that the financial resolution should have a retrospective effect. This we strongly object to. Government may see things from its own point of view. It may frame rules, strict even to harshness, for its servants. But it is unjust and even cruel to change the conditions of service years after one has entered it, especially when the change implies a heavy pecuniary claim on the person. Just think of a Governor or a Viceroy in the third or fourth year of his tenure of office being informed that it has been definitely ruled that his pay is to be considered at so much less per mensem from the very commencement of his service, and that he should in consequence refund the excess calculated at the new rate. We presume it will cause some commotion. The heart-burning will, in the present case, be not the less because the persons affected can spare less the sums demanded than Governors and Viceroys. Is this, again, we wonder, a new way discovered to improve the financial position of the country? The resolution in question is tentative in its character. At present only information and reports are called for. We hope that each head of department and each local Government will have something to urge against their subordinates being treated in this shabby way.

Complaints made by Captain Hearsay about the treatment he received while in jail and recommendation to Government to enquire into them.

21. In noticing the letter published by Captain Hearsay describing the miseries suffered by him in prison and the treatment he received at the hands of Dr. Hall, the Superintendent of the Jail, the Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 28th March, says:—If the description given by the Captain be correct, the conduct of Dr. Hall was very censurable, and due enquiries ought to be made by Government into the complaint. If Captain Hearsay, a courageous Englishman who is able to carry his complaints to the authorities, was subjected to such a treatment as he describes, the condition of poor Native prisoners may well be conceived, and in the interests of justice and humanity an enquiry ought to be instituted into the condition of prisons in India and the conduct of their Superintendents. [Several other papers express similar sentiments.]

Remarks in connection with the circular and notice about the possession of mowra flowers in the Thána District.

22. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 25th March, writes:—We referred some time ago to a circular issued by the Collector of Thána declaring the possession of mowra flowers illegal and liable to punishment. We have now before us the text of the circular and the notice issued thereon. The material part of the circular runs as follows:—"Any one not holding a license to distil liquor, if found in possession of mowra flowers capable of being used for distillation, is guilty under Section 43 (f) of Bombay Act V of 1878. Further, under Section 53 it is to be presumed that a person in possession of articles ordinarily used for distillation is guilty of the offence under Section 4 unless the contrary is proved. Therefore the person who may be found in possession of mowra flowers must prove that the flowers were held by him in his possession for the purpose of using them himself as food for men or cattle or selling them to another for the same purpose. If he sells the flowers to any person knowing that they are likely to be used for illicit distillation, his previous possession may, we think, be regarded as for the purpose of distillation, since he knows that they will not be used for purposes other than distillation. Therefore if a trader has the flowers in his possession it ought to be easy for him to prove whether or not they are used for food for men or cattle. When a person is found to be in possession of the flowers and is not able to prove that he uses them for food for men or cattle, it is quite clear for what purpose he has them in his possession." The notice goes further than the circular. It declares all possession of mowra flowers to be for illicit distillation, and directs, on pain of prosecution, all persons who may have such flowers in their possession to relieve themselves of such possession within seven days after the date of the notice. This notice itself is enough to show how mischievous such a circular is likely to prove. The Collector issues a prohibition only as regards illicit distillation and makes possession prima facie illegal. The ábkári officers forthwith prohibit all possession and threaten immediate prosecution. The circular and the notice have, we are glad to learn, been somewhat modified since we last referred to them, but we fear the mischief will not be stopped until they are absolutely withdrawn. Government are perfectly justified in prohibiting illicit distillation, but any wholesale prohibition of possession of an article of food must lead to undoubted hardship and oppression. We are credibly informed that executive orders like the one above referred to have long been in force and have practically stopped all dealing in mowra flowers. The Government were foiled in their Mowra Bill, but they are apparently carrying out by executive orders what they failed to do by legislation.

The suggestion made by the Englishman to promote Native military officers to responsible posts in the reformed armies of Native States approved.

23. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 24th March, says:—The Englishman makes a suggestion with regard to the promotion of Native military officers that requires to be carefully considered. It says that for the present at least Natives cannot be promoted over Europeans. They cannot get rid of their habits. They will have to lead exclusive lives and will not be able to join their brother officers in the mess-room. Owing to these difficulties in the way, the promotion of Subhedár-Majors to any higher rank in the British army is not a question of the immediate future. As a remedy, the Englishman newspaper suggests that Native officers might with advantage receive commissions in the reformed armies of Native States. The suggestion is a practical one. Though we would like to see Native officers rising to eminence in the British army itself, yet there are difficulties in the way, and hence we are not unwilling to see a compromise effected. Let the armies of Native States be improved and let the ambition of Native officers have an opening there. Native soldiers will feel confidence in their Native commanders and the Rájas will feel more at home if their armies are placed under the command of Native officers than under European commanders.

Death of Colonel Watson, Political Agent, Káthiáwár, regretted.

24. The Káthiáwár Times (82), in its issue of the 24th March, says:—The sudden death of Colonel J. W. Watson has cast a widespread gloom over the whole of Káthiáwár and would be universally regretted. His long and intimate connection with the Rájwáda of the Bombay Presidency, and chiefly with that of Káthiáwár, had given him a great insight into the ways and habits of the Chiefs and their subjects. His decisions of the Rájasthánik Court alone have won him everlasting fame. The late Sir Maxwell Melvill once expressed that he had never known that a military officer was capable of writing such able and sound decisions. On Káthiáwár political matters he was a standard authority, and was undoubtedly the best informed Government official in this province. The friendly feeling that he always evinced for the Native States, the great sympathy he showed for them on all occasions and his exertions for their welfare had endeared him to them. In diplomacy and administrative capacity he was in no way inferior to the Honourable James Peile and General Barton. His undoubted ability is proved by the name he made in each department in which he served. By the death of Colonel Watson Government have lost an officer of great distinction and high accomplishments, and the Native States a kind and sympathising friend. Great sympathy is felt for the wife and the children of the deceased. [A few other Gujaráti papers also regret the death of Colonel Watson.]

Suggestion in connection with the appointment of the Political Agent, Káthiáwár, in place of the late Colonel Watson.

25. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 29th March, says:—At the present juncture, when Government contemplate introducing innovations more or less foreign to this province, it is indispensably necessary that we should have a very strong man in charge of the Agency. The post of the Political Agent, Káthiáwár, is most important and onerous. The Agent has to deal with not one or a couple of States but a good many, and unless we have a powerful man at the helm, matters are not likely to go on smoothly. The management of a couple of States has aroused the dire indignation of Government and led them to think that Káthiáwár is the most mismanaged province, perhaps, in the whole of India. But we can assure Government that it is not so. The management of certain States is anything but creditable, and to the administrators of such States Government should issue peremptory orders that within a stipulated time they must be able to show better results. To put all the States on the black list is hardly a wise piece of policy. Certain resolutions and orders of Government seem to have greatly alarmed the Chiefs and have led them to imagine that Government have determined to divest them of all powers and to reduce them to mere pageants. Government should recognise their powers, but when they find that they are beginning to be incapable of exercising them well they must distinctly let them understand so. Nothing but a better selection of administrators for Native States would bring about the desired change, as the Chiefs, with few exceptions, do not seem to take active part in the administration. In great many instances we have to look to treaty rights and precedents. To a great extent the policy adopted by Government in respect of this province is defective and retrogressive. The policy that endeavours to do things secretly and attempts at concealment naturally gives rise to suspicion. We ask Government why administration reports of Native States should not be published. What is there in them to keep secret, and what is there in them which alarms the Government? If the whole story be published, we can know the policy, the resources and the trustworthiness of the States, and an open and outspoken State is likely to enjoy as much confidence as is conceded to an open and outspoken man. It is this piece of policy which renders this province a source of weakness rather than of strength. We ask Government to appoint here a Political Agent of unusual ability and force of character—one who could bring about a better state of affairs in Káthiáwár without injuring the States and without reducing the Chiefs to mere dummies. [The Rájyabhakt (127), in its issue of the 26th March, mentions several rumours which are said to be current amongst well-known Káthiáwári inhabitants of Bombay in connection with the alleged suicide committed by Colonel Watson, says that no sensible person can believe any of them to be true, and requests the Bombay Government to appoint such a man to the Káthiáwár Political Agency as has had no connection whatever with the province.]

Invidious distinction made in punishing Europeans and Natives convicted of the same offence.

26. The Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 30th March, says:—It is a common complaint in this country that European Magistrates and Judges make an invidious distinction between European and Native culprits convicted of the same offence, punishing the former with a light sentence and visiting the latter with severe punishment, and it is to be regretted that fresh instances of such partial treatment should occur now and then. It will do to quote four recent instances in support of this assertion. (1) A short time ago Private Reynolds was tried by the Honourable Mr. Justice Straight and a jury in the Allahabad High Court for having caused grievous hurt to Mohansing, a Chowkidár or forest guard. The accused was found guilty of the offence for which he was arraigned, and the jury recommended him to mercy. The Judge sentenced the accused to three months' imprisonment. This sentence is evidently lenient, leading the public to believe that a straightforward Judge like Mr. Justice Straight succumbed to the weakness common to European Judges of showing leniency to their own countrymen. (2) Mr. Cooper, Chief Presidency Magistrate, Bombay, sentenced four seamen belonging to a man-of-war in the harbour, convicted of the offences of doing mischief to property and hindering a police officer from doing his duty, to a fine of ten rupees each. (3) Mr. Crawley-Boevey recently convicted some Pársi students of the offence of having hindered some Bombay policemen from discharging their duty, and fined each of the accused Rs. 20, giving the case a serious aspect. (4) In February last Mr. Hamilton convicted a Pársi student of having torn the coat of a policeman. The student stated in defence that the policeman gave him a push, and in defending himself the coat was torn. Mr. Hamilton remarked to the accused that he had a mind to sentence him to be flogged, but since the accused's father had paid the price of the policeman's coat he (the accused) was allowed to go with a warning not to commit a similar offence in future. Several other similar cases can be quoted. It is to be hoped that Government or the High Court will take steps to prevent such invidious distinction being made in the punishment of Europeans and Natives.

Escape of two European prisoners from the Calcutta jail and the alleged leniency of the punishment inflicted upon them.

27. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 24th March, writes :—The two plucky jail-birds who effected their escape from the Calcutta Presidency Jail have been most skilfully tracked and recaptured. We are much surprised at the magisterial leniency in punishing Wagner and Healy, but leniency in the case of European offenders is often the bane of administration of justice in this country, but what strikes us as admirable even in an escaped prisoner is the handsome recognition by Healy of the skill and pluck with which the Sub-Inspector of Police, Bábu Preonáth Mukerji, while the superior European officers were fumbling about, caught them. This is what Healy said : "Most plucky Native whom I have ever known, and his conduct could not have been better if he had been a European; while after the capture he acted with great kindness." And yet Government will not move and effect both efficiency and saving of money by recruiting the service with selected Natives. Herein service-interest finds full play, and the sons of the soil, for one reason or another, are denied all entrance into the higher grades of the police service. [The Satyă Shodhak (58) and a few other papers also complain that the sentence passed upon convicts Wagner and Healy for escaping from the jail is lenient.]

The case of two troopers of His Excellency Lord Reay's body-guard assaulting a Christian cartman commented upon.

28. In noticing the case in which two troopers of His Excellency the Governor's body-guard and a horse-keeper have been fined by Mr. Ryan, Second Presidency Magistrate, Bombay, for assaulting a Christian cartman, the Bombay Samáchár (92), in its issue of the 27th March, says :—The quarrel between the troopers and the cartman that led to the assault seems to have arisen from the unwillingness of the latter and other cartmen to be employed on the work which the troopers wished them to do, and from the force used by the troopers to make them do it. This sort of compulsion ought not to have been used by the accused, who should have taken the aid of the police to obtain the necessary number of carts. It is to be hoped that the attention of His Excellency Lord Reay will be drawn to the case, and that orders will be issued to the members of His Excellency's household to obtain all articles required for His Excellency's use with the consent of the persons owning them. If this be done, His Excellency's name will not be mixed up with such unpleasant occurrences.

Transfer of Mr. Dayárám Gidumal to Sind as Acting District Judge of Hyderabad recommended.

29. The Sind Sudhár (167), in its issue of the 23rd March, says :—Mr. Unwin, Acting District Judge of Hyderabad, has been granted nine months' furlough on medical certificate, and pending the appointment of his successor, Colonel Grant, Judge and Sessions Judge, Karáchi, will do his work. We hope that the vacancy will be filled up at an early date, for otherwise the work of either the Karáchi or the Hyderabad District Court will be seriously interfered with. This seems to be the best opportunity for transferring Mr. Dayárám Gidumal to Sind. Lately he has been promoted and appointed Judge and Sessions Judge of Broach. By his appointment as District Judge in Sind the work will be disposed of, not only satisfactorily but also speedily, as being a native of the province and therefore, well acquainted with the language, he will not experience so many difficulties as a foreigner does.

A recommendation to hold the special examination for subordinate accountants also at Karáchi.

30. A correspondent of the Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 20th March, says:—Last year it was notified in the Sind official Gazette that the special examination for subordinate accountants of the Poona Science College will simultaneously be held at Karáchi on the 9th July 1888, and it was held accordingly in the Superintending Engineer's office. But it is now rumoured that this examination will this year be held at Poona only and not at Karáchi. If it be a fact, it will rather be hard for the Sindis, who will have to undergo many difficulties. Will not the Government be pleased to order that a simultaneous examination be held at Karáchi as a centre for this province like last year?

The talátis in the Ahmedabad District and their corrupt practices, and a request to Mr. James, Collector of Ahmedabad.

31. The Nyáyadarshak (122), in its issue of the 25th March, refers to the enquiry that is being made by Mr. James, Collector of Ahmedabad, into the misdeeds of the talátis (village accountants) and survey kárkuns, observes that some talátis are said to take a rupee or two every year from the rayats for signing certain documents, that they forcibly take articles of food from the poor villagers, that they buy land within their districts in the name of some relative, that they lend money to the rayats, and that the Mukhi (village headman) and the Haváldár are also said to take part to some extent in these matters, and requests Mr. James to appoint an independent and honest officer to enquire into the matter and to have the delinquents severely punished. [A correspondent writes to the Hitechchhu (80) of Ahmedabad of the 28th March to complain of the talátis being given to corruption, and remarks that some of them are said to extort money from the village traders and to make some money every year in connection with the collection of the income-tax.]

Visit paid by a gang of highwaymen to the outskirts of the village of Khergaon in the Surat District.

32. A correspondent of the Jáme Jamshed (109), in its issue of the 25th March, says:—At about 10 o'clock at night on the 17th instant, a gang of highwaymen, numbering about forty, assembled on the outskirts of the village of Khergaon in the Surat District and held a consultation for about an hour. Several men of this gang were armed with spears and two carried guns. The Burudiás (basket-makers) near whose houses the gang had assembled were so much afraid of it that they had no courage to go and give timely information of the occurrence to the police in the village. Reports are rife about the perpetration of robberies and plunder in the neighbourhood of the village, but the police do not seem to go daily on their rounds. It is to be hoped that the police authorities will take due notice of this state of things.

A complaint against the Kaira police.

33. The Kaira Vartamán (111), in its issue of the 27th March, complains of the order prohibiting the possession and sale of detonating crackers used with toy pistols in the town of Kaira, and says that it has been ordered that these crackers should be confiscated and the sellers thereof be prosecuted, that the shops of about half-a-dozen traders were searched by the police for the purpose on the morning of the 26th March, and that it is tyrannical that the order in question should have been suddenly issued without giving previous notice to the public.

Complaint against some Hindu police officers in Sind.

34. The Muawin-i-Majma-i-Muhammadi (165), in its issue of the 24th March, says:—This week we have received complaints against two Hindu police officers; but as we cannot say how far they are true, we do not like to publish the letters of the correspondents. But this much is certain that Hindu police officers are not on good terms with the Mahomedan zamindárs. One of the correspondents writes that about ten or twelve days ago, property worth about Rs. 6,000 or Rs. 7,000 and Rs. 5,000 in gold and clothes were stolen in his village in the district of Hyderabad. The theft was at once reported to the police officer, who only entered Rs. 1,000 in the diary column "amount of property stolen." Some of the suspected persons were searched and property worth Rs. 200 was found in their possession. The correspondent adds that if the other suspected persons had also been searched, the whole of the property would have been recovered. But the Chief Constable for some reasons did not do so, and thus the whole of the property with the exception of Rs. 200 has been lost. Another correspondent also complains of the conduct of the Chief Constable Lálsing. He says that the Superintendent of Police has suspended him on account of his being in league with budmashes. Lálsing, when formerly emloyed in the Hyderabad District, was tried on several occasions on criminal charges, but was acquitted. The correspondent adds that since his transfer the number of thefts in Sákro has considerably increased. It is to be hoped that the Collector and the Police Superintendent, who are now encamped in that táluka, will redress the grievances of the people.

Part II.—Legislation.

Bombay Village Sanitation Bill commented upon.

35. The Rást Goftár (83), in its issue of the 24th March, writes:—Sir Raymond West had no doubt a full perception of all the difficulties in the way of any legislation on the subject of village sanitation, and he has accordingly made the Bill as simple as possible in its operation, allowing it a flexibility of system suited to the variations of local circumstances. If any village were to adopt voluntary measures of sanitation and carry them out to satisfaction, it would not be brought within the operations of the proposed Act. We apprehend that the number of villages enlightened enough to look after their sanitary requirements without any external pressure will be small, at all events for some time to come, and consequently the Collectors will have in many instances to exercise the power, which it is proposed under the Bill to give them, of nominating committees with authority to try cases of nuisance and to punish offenders against the rules laid down for the sanitation of the villages. The Bill being regarded as yet in the light of a tentative measure, it is wisely stipulated that the committees should work with the least possible pressure upon the villagers, and with the least possible disturbance of their habits and customs. We hope that no politician, however extreme his views may be, will be sorry that the elective principle is not at present introduced in the formation of these rural committees. We hope, with the Honourable Mr. Behechardás and the Honourable Mr. Telang, that some means will be devised by the Select Committee which will examine this Bill to do away with the more elaborate machinery, although it is evidently intended to impose it upon villagers as something of a punitive measure. But we think that the Bill is so framed that those villages which will cordially assist in carrying out the law will be able to avoid "the unwelcome presence of the tax-gatherer." [The Gujaráti (78) of the 24th March approves of the suggestion that the Local Funds authorities should collect the new sanitary tax, if imposed, instead of creating a new department for its collection, and observes that it would have been better if the district Civil Surgeons, Sanitary Commissioners and their Assistants had been empowered to exercise control over the village sanitary committees or boards instead of the District Collectors and Assistant Collectors, as the villagers are not as much afraid of the former as they are of the latter, who are tax-gathering officials. The Surya Prakásh (85) of the 23rd March disapproves of the levy of any additional tax from the villagers, and suggests that the village sanitary committees should be composed of at least six members, and that the revenue patel and the police patel should on no account whatever be nominated to the committee.]

36. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 24th March, says:—It is a pity that the Village Sanitation Bill is based upon a principle that is open to serious objection. What it aims at is the substitution of imperial for local administration. The Honourable Sir R. West's statement is quite clear as to what is meant by dividing the villages into three groups and making the different parts of the Bill applicable to the groups as circumstances may require. The villages ought to be grouped upon some well-defined principle. A gradation of rural boards must be established and a desire for sanitary reform created by rewards and progress kept up by fear of punishment. It is possible to conceive the administration of a District Collector or a Mámlatdár becoming so bad as to warrant his transfer to some other locality and to expect improvement from the change; but it is impossible to conceive the sanitation of a town or a village becoming so bad as to warrant the improvement of it by a similar method. Villages in the presidency have come to be the foci of epidemic diseases, because the people in them do not care to improve their surroundings. The 'immobility of custom,' as the Government of India calls it, is so great that novel ideas fail to produce an impression. And the remedy now suggested in the Bill is to entrust the management to the villagers themselves. In framing the Bill sight is lost of the secret of success in sanitary matters. Localize the cause of disease and stamp it out. This can be done not by persuasion, but by earnest work, the result of faith which the rural population most decidedly lacks. The annual reports of the Sanitary Commissioner give in sufficient detail the sanitary requirements of most of the villages, and what remains to be done is the finding out of funds and the execution of works. The village people have declared their inability to give us the funds, and we know from the industrial condition of the villages that they can at best place their labour at our disposal. The method of getting the work done, therefore, lies in parental treatment. The two non-official representatives of the people in the local Legislative Council have emphatically exposed this weak point in the Bill, and unless Government is prepared to meet it the Village Sanitation Act will, we are afraid, be as inoperative as have been its predecessors. The monetary difficulty cannot be avoided. At best it can be mitigated by calling up and securing popular contributions. To ensure public pecuniary support Government must, however, lead the way. Emergent works ought to be run up from loan funds, and if villagers are asked to contribute in kind instead of in coin, we feel sure there will be little difficulty. We suggested the introduction of the 'faski' and its farming out, because that is the easiest method of levying contributions in kind and turning the realizations into money. Government ought to frame rules under which grants-in-aid can be given from Provincial and Imperial funds according to the nature of the work. If this system of grants-in-aid can be introduced there is chance of making charity funds flow in the direction of useful sanitary works. The spirit of making charitable grants towards the digging of wells and building of dharmashálás is dying out, but it is not dead and can be usefully revived.

37. The Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 25th March, publishes from a local-board member the following thoughts on the Village Sanitation Bill:—The framer of the Bill says that the Act is not to apply to places or localities where sanitary provision has already been made in accordance with the intentions of the act by the villagers. Now this observation of the honourable gentleman seems to be of no practical use. Where are the villagers who will take the initiative in sanitary measures and thus fulfil without any outside pressure the intentions of the Act? If we had such people here there would be no need of the Penal Code and other laws. However, taking for granted for argument's sake that there are such people and that there are villages that are taking proper sanitary precautions, what guarantee is there that the sanitary bureaucrats will be satisfied with them? In brief, although the Act appears to be confined in its operation to unwilling and backward villages, it will practically be forced gradually on all places. Again, the power of enforcing the provisions of the Act seems to be given to the Collector of the district. The Collector is also to form the village committees and appoint their chairmen and members. With such power given to the Collector, it needs no prophet to tell us in what manner the work of the sanitary committee will be done and how independently and earnestly the members will discharge their new duties. The members will naturally try to say ditto to what the Collector or the Magistrate, whose nominees they are, has said. A particular sanitary measure may not be acceptable to the villagers owing to its being a costly one or a novelty to them, yet it may be forced on the villagers, a new tax may be imposed to meet this charge on the overtaxed villagers, and thus what is intended to be beneficial to the people may produce harmful consequences. These considerations do not seem to have suggested themselves to the honourable mover of the Bill. In brief, we take objection to the power given by the Act to the Collector in respect of the appointments on the village committees, to the entrusting of such important functions as the supply of water and the like to such committees, to the power given to the committees to try all cases in respect of any breach or non-fulfilment of sanitary regulations and to the power of taxing a village for a particular sanitary measure; and we are therefore of opinion that all the sections that give these powers may safely be expunged. It is not to be supposed that because we object to the important sections of the Bill we are against village sanitation; what we contend for is that the overtaxed villagers may not be taxed anew, that authority may not be given where it is likely to be abused, that no evil may creep in under the cloak of sanitary improvement, and that the already bad condition of the village population may not become worse. In our opinion the following should be the duties of the village sanitation committees:—(1) To keep pure the existing water-supply. (2) To prohibit people from using for privy purposes ground which if so used is likely to be injurious to public health. (3) To submit a statement of village requirements to the táluka boardand to supply information to that board and in other ways to assist it. No more functions should be entrusted to the village committees. One-sixth of the Local Fund should be credited to the account of the village committees for expenditure for sanitary purposes. This one-sixths together with such special grant as the Local Fund Committee may give for special purposes or the Government may hand over for particular sanitary measures, plus subscriptions from the people, should form the revenue of the village committee and should be credited in the táluka accounts in its name. The formation of village committees and appointments on them should be entrusted to táluka boards. The village committees should be considered as sub-committees of the táluka board and should submit a budget every year to that board. The kulkarni or taláti should be ex-officio member of the village sanitation committee. The bye-laws of the village committee should be made by that committee and submitted to the táluka board; and the táluka board should consider them and finally, pass them, subject to the approval of the Collector. The zilla board may, according to the requirements of a particular táluka, appoint Sanitary Inspectors. The public vaccinators who at present do the work of vaccination simply may be dispensed with as their work can be done by these newly appointed Inspectors. They should be under the control of the táluka boards. Their duty should be to see whether or not the provisions of the Act are respected. They should be invested with the power of hearing complaints under the Sanitation Act, and, if satisfied of the breach of any sanitary regulation, of fining the offender. Processes should be served by the police and fines recovered by them. Táluka and village boards should always be on friendly terms and should assist each other in every way. If the Government really wish that people should not be oppressed, that sanitation of villages should improve, that people should be educated so as to take interest in public affairs and that the already impoverished, helpless and miserable rural population should not sink down any further, then the present Bill should be subjected to modification and revision on the lines suggested above.

38. The Jagadádarsh (34), in its issue of the 24th March, says:—Should Sir Raymond West's Bill become law, the village population will be subjected to much inconvenience. The sanitation committees are entrusted with large powers and there is every likelihood of those powers being abused. For this reason we protest against the Bill. The Mámlatdárs are now doing what is necessary to keep a village clean. If more cleanliness is needed, the Mámlatdárs may be invested with some powers by which the objects may be gained. These committees and boards are unnecessary evils, and the fewer such evils the better will it be for the people. It is a standing complaint that water is fouled in many villages. But we make bold to say that Government is to blame for it. For revenue purposes Government farm out in many villages waste plots of land near beds of streams for melon cultivation, and these heavily manured melon-beds force into diluted sewage the daily diminishing water-supply of these villages and that of the villages below. Government ought to stop this farming system in the interests of the public.

39. The Kesari (39), in its issue of the 26th March, says:—The recent resolutions of the Government of India on the sanitary improvement of towns and villages are full of good intentions. But the direction which they mean to take for gaining the desired object does not commend itself to us. The necessity for cleanliness and the distinction between what is clean and what is not are things about which even in an advanced town people show a lamentable ignorance. What then is to be expected of ignorant villagers where the light of knowledge has not yet reached? We are therefore of opinion that sanitary provisions should not be enforced in backward villages by means of fines and such other means of creating a forced respect for law. The people should be slowly and gradually educated to appreciate the benefits of improved sanitation and much should be left to their discretion. If Government were to enact a sanitary code and go about enforcing it in every village nolens volens, much oppression would follow. We hope the committee that is sitting to consider the Sanitation Bill will take all these things into their consideration.

40. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 28th March, says:—The speech with which the Village Sanitation Bill was introduced by Sir R. West is full of facts and instructions, as was to be expected, and deals with the subject with as much fullness as was practicable at the initiary stage. The main feature of the Bill is the attempt made to give all possible elasticity to its provisions so as to make it suit the diverse requirements of different villages and towns. At the first blast of the thing the Bill does look to be one which will not find favour with the villagers at large. The question to which its provisions converge is that of funds, and the public will naturally be frightened at being called upon to pay additional taxation. This portion of the Bill will exercise the minds of most people and will perhaps monopolise the attention which it will be desirable to devote to its other phases.

41. The Jáme Jamshed (109), in its issue of the 30th March, expresses deep gratitude to Miss Nightingale for taking continuous interest in the sanitation of Indian villages, and once more returns to the subject of the Village Sanitation Bill, observing:—What is required for the due sanitation of the villages is that the source of water-supply should be scrupulously protected from pollution of every kind, that the village streets should be daily swept and the sweepings removed, that no nuisance of any kind should be allowed to be committed in the village and its surroundings, that the patel should be entrusted with this work, giving him two men to assist in its performance, that the Sanitary Commissioner and his department should be made to visit every village at least once a month for the purpose of getting removed any nuisances lying within the village precincts and of explaining to the villagers the benefits of sanitation, that the patel's two assistants should, on approved service, be presented with pieces of rent-free land for their maintenance, and that small manuals on sanitation in the different vernaculars of the presidency should be disseminated among the village population and introduced in the primary schools. If these measures are adopted the rural population will kindly take to sanitation and soon learn to appreciate it.

PART III.—Education.

Proposed extension of the Arts course of the Bombay University disapproved.

42. Referring to the proposed reforms in the Bombay University curriculum, the Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 28th March, writes:—The aim under the new arrangement is a further literary comprehensiveness and a still further development of the thinking faculty—an achievement which we all would most willingly have; but mere extension of the curriculum will not accomplish this object. What we prefer to have is a staff of first-class men from Oxford and Cambridge to preside over our educational destinies, and improvement in this direction will easily accomplish what the extension of our Arts course from three to four years is intended to do.

Without meaning offence to anybody, those interested in our education will perceive that the opposition to the contemplated extension is not unnatural. Let the staff be strengthened and the disease of educational deficiency will cure itself.

Government resolution on the employment of the successful students of the Veterinary College, Bombay, criticized.

43. The Jáme Jamshed (109), in its issue of the 28th March, says:—The Government resolution on the employment of the successful students of the Veterinary College, Bombay, lays down that a monthly salary of Rs. 25 will be sufficient to a veterinary practitioner employed in an hospital opened by a municipality or a local board, as he will earn some income from private practice. But there is little probability of the rustic population engaging the services of a practitioner. They are so poor as not to be able to pay for medical advice for themselves; they have not yet learnt to appreciate European veterinary art and charitable hospitals will have therefore to be opened for the treatment of sick animals. The monthly salary of Rs. 25 is very little remuneration to persons who after receiving a middling education spend three years to learn the veterinary art, and is sure to prove a great discouragement to any more students joining the College hereafter. It is therefore to be hoped that the pay of the Veterinary College graduates will be fixed at Rs. 75 at the least, Government and the municipality or the local board doubling the sum of the grant now intended to be made by each party.

PART IV.—Municipalities.

Exorbitant price charged by the municipality of Hyderabad for sale of land for building purposes.

44. The Sind Sudhár (167), in its issue of the 23rd March, says:—We have repeatedly pointed out that the town of Hyderabad is overcrowded, and that, therefore, the Hyderabad Municipality, following the example of the Karáchi Municipality, should sell land at lower rates. It is greatly to be regretted and wondered at that the selling price of land in the town of Hyderabad should be higher than that prevailing in Karáchi or Bombay. Unless the Hyderabad Municipality gives away land to the people at considerably reduced rates, the insanitary condition of the town and overcrowding now complained of will not be removed.

Appointment of a new president of the Surat Municipality.

45. The Gujarát Darpan (76), in its issue of the 28th March, observes that Khán Bahádur Mir Gulám Bába Khán has resigned the post of the president of the Surat Municipal Corporation which he did not fill with much credit to himself, that there are several able men among the municipal commissioners who would discharge creditably the duties of the president if Government were pleased to appoint any of them to that post, and that the District Collector should by no means be appointed to the vacant office which a non-official gentleman ought to get. On the other hand, the Gujarát Mitră (79), in its issue of the 24th March, says that taking all the circumstances of the case into consideration, the appointment of the District Collector to the presidentship is highly advisable.

PART V.—Native States.

Alleged treasonable correspondence of His Highness the Mahárája of Kashmere and the proposed arrangements about the administration of that State.

46. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 24th March, says:—The heat of excitement in regard to Kashmere affairs has cooled down. The Under Secretary of State for India said in the House of Commons that no great importance was attached to the letters. In fact, when Diwán Latchmansing denied his connection with the letters, the whole superstructure could not but collapse. Yet we are told that Kashmere will be placed under a Council of Regency presided over by the Resident, Colonel Nisbet. This is not entirely improbable. Those, who remember the Malhár Ráo Gáikwád case and how Government changed its front at the last moment, will not be surprised to find the Government dealing with Kashmere just in the same way. The Mahárája will be deprived of powers for "political" reasons which no one outside the charmed circle, not even the Mahárája, will have a right to know. The State will come under British influence, and in view of complications on the frontier this would not be an unwelcome arrangement. We do not mean to say that if the State be placed under a Regency we may attribute it to this motive. We are simply speaking of the probable result of such a step. A fresh field and pastures new will be opened to deserving young men of England, sons and nephews of highly-placed officials in the Political Department, and the whole thing will be settled to the satisfaction of all, except the Mahárája probably; but who cares for him? The Tribune newspaper of Lahore has a curious tale to give out. It has been freely said that the Mahárája had made certain admissions. In the face of such an assertion it was impossible for us to express much sympathy for the Mahárája. How could we say even a single word in favour of a prince who was reported to have admitted the planning of murders? But we are glad to state that the Tribune gives the lie direct to this report. It says that it has learnt after inquiries that the Mahárája has not admitted the genuineness of the "incriminating" letters. They are "altogether spurious, deliberate forgeries, intended by the Mahárája's enemies to damage his reputation, bring ruin on the State and to further their own selfish objects." We further learn that a certain clique in Kashmere has been all along trying to coerce the Mahárája to sanction such arrangements as would deprive him of all real power and render him a mere ornamental figure-head. In fact, pressure was put upon the Mahárája to extort a confession from him that the alleged incriminating letters were written by him; but he has stood firm, and baffled his enemies in this respect. Colonel Nisbet, who was a friend of the late Mahárája, has fallen a victim to that sorceress which spoils many a good heart, we mean, the love of power. He has been bullying the Mahárája to no end. His attitude towards the Mahárája may have had an indirect effect in encouraging some enemy of the Mahárája to fabricate evidence incriminating His Highness. Colonel Nisbet with his prejudiced mind has, no doubt, swallowed all this, believing it to be genuine without pausing to inquire. The lot of an Indian prince is a very hard one. Being placed in an exalted sphere he has very little of the power that attends upon such position. On the contrary, he has to obey the behests of the political officer, and if on any occasion he is disposed to struggle for independence, there is an effective way of silencing him, namely, by accusing him of sedition. When the question lies between him and the political officer there is no need to say whom the Government of India is naturally disposed to believe and support. This question of the relations of Native Princes with the political officers at their courts is a very serious one and has been often urged upon the attention of the Government of India, but we are sorry to say that hitherto Government has turned a deaf ear to all warnings and requests. Does the Government wait until some grave catastrophe occurs? [The Gujaráti (78) of the 24th March quotes the account published by the Tribune newspaper regarding the Mahárája of Kashmere, and says that from it it appears that a new intrigue has been set up by some persons to ruin the Mahárája, and that if this account be true, Colonel Nisbet should at once be removed from Kashmere. The Gujaráti wishes, for the good name of the British rule, that the news regarding the appointment of a Council to administer the State, presided over by Colonel Nisbet, should turn out false, and that Government should speedily publish particulars about the state of affairs in Kashmere. Several newspapers of this week disapprove of the alleged policy of the Government of India of indirectly assuming the administration of Kashmere by the appointment of a Council to govern that State, and freely canvass the motives of Government.]

47. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 24th March, writes:—According to the latest news from Kashmere the present Mahárája has put the administration into commission for five years, during which period the government is to be conducted under a Regency composed of Native officers presided over by the Resident. Government interference in this State, as in others, may be justifiable on the ground of disorder and bad rule; however, the simultaneous appearance of the alleged "treasonable correspondence" with the new arrangements is an occurrence that will not be looked upon with favour by the people. Similar charges in addition to the present ones have cropped up at intervals and their unimpeachability has been questioned—a circumstance that must trace this piece of a new political departure in regard to a Native State to some other cause or causes than mere disorder. In such matters as these silence on the part of Government is misconstrued and creates a sort of unnecessary uneasiness that, instead of strengthening the bonds of unity between the rulers and the ruled, only keeps them at a distance from each other. Lord Dufferin has frequently acknowledged the Native States to be the main-stay of the British Indian Empire, and if Kashmere is to be handled in this fashion immediately after his departure, what faith can the States have in the principle of continuity! We hope Government action in this matter will be explained and thus will extinguish the cause of uneasiness.

A suggestion to do away with Political Agents and their Assistants and Deputy Assistants in Native States.

48. The same newspaper says:—The history of Kashmere and many other Native States is a painful narrative of the overbearing attitude of some of our political officers towards those to advise whom and to look after whose interests they are mainly appointed. How the States have fared and the misery and tribulation many a State has had to go through, the history of the Baroda poisoning scandal of 1874-75 and the history of the Bhopál scandals during the past three years fully lay bare. The object for which Government created the Political Agencies having been accomplished—not that they have been a credit all round—they ought now to be done away with, inasmuch as they have often set the paramount power and the feudatory States by the ear. While British supremacy in this land was being consolidated and while there was any real fear of mischief from Native States the presence of political officers was no doubt necessary. But now the face of the country is quite changed and the net-work of railways has brought every point of vantage within such easy distance that within a space of twenty-four hours a large army corps may be mobilized and concentrated on any given point. Moreover, the loyalty of the States is unquestioned—a fact that must emphasize the consideration that the time has arrived when a pretty large portion of these agencies might with advantage be safely cut down. We are not for their total abolition. Agencies on a small scale may be yet kept up at different centres with advantage, but the army of Political Assistants and Deputy Assistants that besiege so many Darbárs might be done away with with advantage both to the paramount power and the feudatory States. [The Hitechchhu (80) of Ahmedabad of the 28th March complains of the Residents and Political Agents lording it over the Native Princes, and says:—If Government were to enquire into the amount of wealth collected by the political officers they would find hardly 5 per cent. of these officers to have behaved honestly. But why should Government make such an enquiry? Should they thereby manifest their own weakness? If an honest ruler like His Excellency Lord Reay were, however, to do so, Europeans and the Anglo-Indian newspapers would attack and bring him into disgrace as they have done in the Crawford case. Why should he, then, needlessly incur the risk? Our rulers have studied carefully the lesson derived from the native proverb that woe be to him who drives away a strange cow while feeding on edibles belonging to others.]

The rumoured split in the Hyderabad Ministry and the Resident.

49. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 25th March, writes:—According to the Statesman newspaper, Hyderabad affairs are again drifting into old grooves. Mr. Howell, who first set himself to clear the Augean stable of Hyderabad politics, has himself, it seems, fallen into the hands of intriguers, and there is again going on the old game of parties and factions. If rumour is to be believed, there is a split in the Hyderabad ministry, one minister seeking to oppose the prime minister and the Resident throwing the weight of his authority against the latter. The result is a dead-lock. The obtrusive interference of the English political officer and his attempt to make the local authorities mere ciphers when the latter do not agree with him are the bane of the administration of Native States. The interference is often well-meant and presumably in the interests of good administration. But the manner in which it is made leads to confusion and puts a stop to harmonious action. The benevolent neutrality which our political officers are in theory bound to assume towards the Native Princes is more often honoured in the breach than in the observance. Political officers are usually able men and it is their ability which often makes them impatient of divergence of opinion. They try to force down the throat of the princes or the ministers their own pet views, and in case there is the least resistance their dignity is offended. When they lend an easy ear to some court intriguer or ambitious and unscrupulous officer their interference becomes all the more harmful.

The financial condition of Gwalior considered critical.

50. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 25th March, says:—Gwalior is suffering from the consequences of Sir Lepel Griffin's misrule. The financial condition of the State is far from satisfactory. The revenues of the State amount to one kror and twenty-one lákhs, while the expenditure is one kror and twenty-eight lákhs and thus there is an annual deficit of seven lákhs of rupees. If this state of things continues, Gwalior will be speedily ruined. The British Government is responsible for all this. The present minister, Bápu Sáheb, an old and experienced servant of the State, is trying hard to restore the balance between income and expenditure, but Sir Lepel Griffin's creatures place obstacles in his way. Men of Sir Lepel Griffin's stamp are of no good to any State. Political Agents should not interfere with the internal economy of any Native State.

The enormous fine of one lákh of rupees inflicted by the Sadar Court of the Indore State on an accused person.

51. The Vártáhar (19), in its issue of the 24th March, says:—The Chief Justice of Indore, in the recent case of the Darbár v. Rangráo Vithal, has sentenced the first accused to pay to the Darbár the never-heard-of fine of Rs. 1,40,000. The most heinous offence under the Indian Penal Code is punished with a fine of Rs. 2,000. We are not aware of any case, nor is there any law, that authorizes such an extraordinary fine as has been ordered to be paid by the Sadar Court of the Indore State.

Employment of officers on the establishment of the Political Agent, Káthiáwár, in the Native States of that province disapproved.

52. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 24th March, writes:—We are tempted to observe that the system of nominating Agency officers to be Kárbháris or other Darbár servants is perhaps undesirable. What began with an initiative from the Chief has degenerated now, we fear, into nomination by the Agency, at least in some cases. The object of forcing an Agency servant on a Chief may be as often good as it may be bad, but the effect of such nomination is bound to be generally bad. The Agency nominee, even when a good man, is obliged to side with the Agency, and if he does not hoodwink or bully his Chief he can hardly help crippling his independence. In considering every question he will be apt to make too much of his Agency experience, and for obvious reasons weak-minded princes will be often at the mercy of the favoured ones of the provincial demi-gods. Perhaps, the worst of this system is that it tends to demoralize the subordinate Agency officers, who will always have an eye on employment in the Native States under their Agency on salaries three or four times larger than what they obtain on the staff of the Political Agent or his Assistants. Here is temptation to indolence and irregularity, if not to downright intrigue. If Native Princes wish for the loan of British trained officers, it would be better for the Government to supply these from the Regulation districts—for Káthiáwár, say, from the Surat Collectorate. This might obviate the chance of intrigue as well as abuse of patronage, and while the Darbárs obtained the best available hands, the Agency would be left to do its work uninfluenced by sordid considerations. On this principle we should also prefer the appointment of outside Europeans to be Administrators. We should like further to have Native gentlemen tried as Administrators for some of the larger States, if there is no rule to the contrary. There is another disadvantage resulting to the Government from this system of employing Agency officers under the States. An officer earning Rs. 200 per mensem is lent to a Chief on Rs. 800 a month. He may have paid Government for years to qualify himself for pension on Rs. 200. He now pays a higher rate for pension on Rs. 800. A few years hence he retires, and Government are called upon to give his pension so long as he lives, on an average of the last few years' salary. In other words, the British tax-payer has to pay this pensioner much more than he is entitled to, because Government were kind enough to send him a few years ago from Rs. 200 a month at the Agency to Rs. 800 under a State. If this is how matters stand, we think the least that Government should do would be to settle with the man before he is lent to a State, and ask him thereafter to make his arrangements for pension with the State and not to count upon the Government paying him at the expense of the British tax-payer. Here we have attempted to sketch the outlines of a scheme for the better administration of Káthiáwár.

Proposed abolition of State Vakils in Káthiáwár disapproved.

53. The Satyă Shodhak (58), in its issue of the 24th March, says:—The Bombay Government, it seems, is not well disposed towards the Native States in Káthiáwár. Some thirty feudatories in that province hitherto enjoyed the privilege of keeping Vakils at the Agency for conducting business with the Political Agents. The Bombay Government is now contemplating the step of abolishing the Agency Vakil altogether. It is also reported that Government has issued a resolution prohibiting the Chiefs to act in concert when making any representation to Government. We do not know positively, but we suspect, that these measures have been taken, because Government are afraid of the unity of interests that prevails in Káthiáwár. To subject the Native Princes to the humiliation of attending the Court of the Political Agent on any trifling business in which they may be concerned is a sure way of making them dissatisfied and jealous.

54. The Suryă Prakásh (85), in its issue of the 23rd March, disapproves of the threatened abolition of State Vakils in attendance on the Political Agent, Káthiáwár, says that they are useful (1) in securing the prestige of the British rule, (2) in preserving cordial and friendly relations between the British Government and the Native States, (3) in seeking the benefits of the States under whom they serve, and (4) in giving prompt answers to any call from the Political Agent, and requests His Excellency Lord Reay to seriously consider the matter before abolishing the Vakils on the score of economy. [A correspondent of the Káthiáwár Times (82) of the 27th March also disapproves of the proposed abolition of State Vakils, and says that the very conception and starting of the idea of abolishing the State Vakils show a deplorable want of anything like a knowledge of the manner and the channel through which the work of the Political Agency in that province is being daily transacted, and that the discouragement of any united action affecting severally the interests of Káthiáwár Chiefs amounts to a denial of justice to them.]

55. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 24th March, writes:—If the information contained in the Bombay Gazette be true, the local Government have, in addition to the proposed abolition of the institution of Darbár Vakils, under consideration a proposal under which all united action in matters affecting severally the interests of Káthiáwár Chiefs will be discouraged. The retention of a Vakil at the Political Agency means much politically, but the States have shown an utter incapacity and inappreciation for properly utilising the privilege, and hence our approval of its abolition; but surely the second privilege cannot be rated so highly as the first. That the Government of His Excellency Lord Reay should initiate such a retrograde measure is quite inexplicable—a practice which has the support of long prescription and which no Government would like to revoke. United representation on one hand and a loving condescension on the other are the very germs of living stability and deserve encouragement in the highest degree. Therein lie the germs of representation which our rulers would do well to develop and not to repress. There is the ground-work, so to say, and we had better try a sort of an incipient system of federation. Our rulers cannot be the worse for such an experiment; on the contrary, they may successfully knit together mutual feelings of love and attachment. We therefore pray Lord Reay not to venture upon a task fraught with distrust and mischief.

The proposed appointment of an Inspector-General of Police for Káthiáwár disapproved.

56. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 24th March, disapproves of the proposed appointment of an Inspector-General of Police for Káthiáwár, saying that such an office, if created, would involve a dual control of the province, that is to say, the Agency and the Darbár would each have a rival in the work of administration, and a serious conflict would be inevitable, and it feels sure that the Government of Bombay will not sanction such a proposal. They might, the paper observes, as well reduce Káthiáwár to the position of a Collectorate.

A suggestion to the Bombay Government in connection with the administration of justice in Káthiáwár.

57. The Rájyabhakt (127) of the 26th March approves of the Government assuming the management and control of the Káthiáwár police, thinks the change will be beneficial to the people of that province, and recommends Government to take over the administration of criminal justice also at the same time.

The people and the Native States of Káthiáwár and a petition prepared by the editor and proprietor of the Rájyabhakt newspaper for presentation to His Excellency Lord Reay on their behalf.

58. The Rájyabhakt (127), in its issue of the 26th March, gives a further instalment of the petition prepared by its editor and proprietor for presentation to His Excellency Lord Reay on behalf of the people and Native Princes of Káthiáwár, attacks and exposes Dr. Barjorji, Mr. Mancherji Mervánji Bhávnagari and Mr. Sims, officers of the Bhávnagar State, and remarks that the Council of Administration established by His Highness the Thákor, which has been praised in the last Administration Report of the Bombay Presidency, is a mere farce and has done more harm than good to the State.

Mr. Lely, Administrator, Porbandar, and his rumoured appointment in Jámnagar.

59. The same newspaper publishes a rumour which, it says, is current in Bombay that the Porbandar Prince is to be shortly entrusted with the management of the State owing to a bank having declined to comply with the proposal made by Mr. Lely, the Administrator, for advancing money for the construction of a railway from Porbandar to Dwárka without the signature of His Highness the Rána, the latter having refused to sign the deed, and asks whether the Rána's thirty lákhs of rupees have all been spent. The paper hesitates to believe the rumour to be true, hears that Mr. Lely is to be appointed to Jámnagar, and says that it is not wrong to infer that His Highness the Jám's present visit to Bombay is intended to stop the appointment in question. The Rájyabhakt is sorry at this state of things, remarks that it was expected that the conduct of His Highness the Jám would lead to such a result, and warns His Highness the Thákor of Bhávnagar to take a lesson therefrom and to have no more connection with the woman Kaiser, on whom he has spent lákhs of rupees and to whom he is trying to present the village of Jira.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

The Government policy of suspicion and distrust in Natives disapproved.

1. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 1st April, contains a long article in which the present distrusting policy of Government towards the Natives is commented upon, and observes that this growing distrust on the part of the rulers gives opportunities to the enemies of India for sowing the seeds of mischief and danger and facilitates to a considerable degree the onward progress of Russia, which has been long watching for an opportunity to possess this country. The secret police circulars and other measures which Government is rumoured to have adopted for maintaining its rule and prestige are all, observes the paper, calculated to have the contrary effect. The loyalty of the people of India is unshakable, and what seems to Government as disloyal and done in a spirit of opposition is really intended to serve as a means of hearty co-operation with the aims and intentions of the benign Government under which the people of India are enjoying unheard-of security of life and property.

The English import duty on Indian silver plate.

2. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 31st March, writes:—It is scarcely a matter for satisfaction to know that the Secretary of State for India has admitted to the Indian Government the equitableness of its demand for the abolition of the English import duty on Indian silver plate, because that admission is coupled with the intimation that the discussion started by the latter cannot with advantage be continued. We should have preferred to be told that the Secretary of State did not admit the justice of the Government of India's demand. But to know that though the claim is admittedly equitable His Lordship's colleagues in the Imperial Government will not concede it, either for the sake of a small fiscal source or the protection of their own small home industry, when they for their own purposes oblige the Government of India to sacrifice a large revenue and when their constituents seek to stifle our staple manufactures, makes one sick at heart and despair of India ever getting financial justice at the hands of England. We respectfully submit that His Excellency the Viceroy in Council ought not to rest till the question is disposed of in favour of India, or else he will ill discharge his duty to the people of this country whose welfare is committed to his care as vicegerent of Her Imperial Majesty the Queen-Empress. And should the representatives of the people themselves be dumb spectators of this unedifying scene? Why should they not at once address a memorial to Parliament on the subject and thus supplement the efforts of the Indian Government? Every motive ought to lead them to adopt that step without delay. They need not wait till the next meeting of the Indian National Congress.

The death of Mr. John Bright, M. P.

3. The same newspaper writes:—A great historical figure, whose unparalleled eloquence and equally unparalleled influence on democracy, surpassed only by that of Mr. Gladstone, and one who has had a large share in the moulding of English politics during the last fifty years and upwards, has been removed by the death of John Bright, M. P. The sage and seer of Birmingham has died full of years and honours. We do not mean the honours which a grateful State confers on its deserving servants, but the homage, rather, which the unanimous voice of a nation pays to one of its trusted leaders. He became the most formidable opponent of the established church, though it must be observed that one of the earliest reforms he suggested was the abolition of the compulsory powers of levying church rates. The triumph of household suffrage, of which Bright was the foremost champion, has in reality changed the whole basis of English politics. "In effect it has made the aristocracy, says another journalist, perfectly well aware that for the future they must either satisfy the democracy or suppress themselves. The salus populi has got a new meaning, and it is the propaganda of Mr. Bright which has given that meaning." England, again, owes him, especially the working classes, a deep debt of gratitude for his unflinching advocacy of free trade, with his colleague of equally unflinching perseverance, the late Mr. Cobden. "That great revolution has been quite as well marked in its effects on the ideals of society as it has its effect on the comfort of the people." So well-known are Mr. Bright's views on Indian affairs that it is hardly necessary to refer to them here. He was the strongest enemy of the East India Company and its unrighteous policy, especially of war and annexation. Never was denunciation more effectual in practical politics, and more scathing in its criticisms, than the famous speech delivered at the time of the renewal of the charter of 1853. We cannot refrain from referring to one epigrammatic sentence of that speech which may be said, according to Mr. Bright, to be the keynote of the policy of John Company. It wrote Christian despatches and consulted un-Christian acts. We fear that sentence might, even after this lapse of time, bear testimony to a State despatch or an Act of the Government of India, now and then, of our own days. It has been said that if Mr. Bright's achievements are measured by the aims which he avowed, it would be found that their magnitude was enormous—so vast is the revolution which he has effected, not merely in the machinery of British institutions, but in the objects of their actions and the colour of their thoughts. In short, it is his integrity and his simplicity of character and motive that has reared for Mr. Bright's fame a solid foundation, more durable than stone or brass, and more striking than the pyramids of Egypt.

4. The Gujaráti (77), in its issue of the 31st March, says:—Mr. John Bright, one of the greatest orators of this century, the tribune of the English people, the lifelong companion of Cobden and a sincere well-wisher of India, has departed from this mortal world after a protracted illness. To England the loss will be an irreparable one, though it will be felt none the less keenly by humanity at large. There are men in this world who, like Burke, were born for mankind; and Cobden and Bright, whose moral, economical and political principles are destined to transform the condition of human society even more largely than has been possible hitherto, evidently belong to that splendid galaxy of great men. The history of the Corn Law agitation, which both of them conducted with unparalleled courage, energy and self-sacrifice amidst tremendous difficulties and trials, deserves to be written in letters of gold for the benefit of future generations. India mourns his loss as deeply and sincerely as England, and although he has physically departed from the bustling theatre of this world, his words and expressions will be often quoted and his example often appealed to. He has laid the people of this country under great obligations by his magnanimous and powerful advocacy, and although his views on particular subjects may be forgotten, the spirit that was in them will ever continue to speak after him. [The Káthiáwár Times (81), in its issue of the 3rd April, deeply laments the loss of Mr. John Bright, and says that England and India have lost in him a great patriot and a truly good and great man.]

5. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 1st April, deeply mourns the loss sustained by India in the death of Mr. John Bright, and suggests for the consideration of the public-spirited citizens of this country the propriety and the necessity for raising a fund for erecting a suitable memorial of the departed advocate of India and keeping his memory ever green. The paper further suggests that the memorial should take a form and be of such a nature as to be intimately connected with, and give a strong impetus to, the Indian National Congress.

6. The Rást Goftár (82), in its issue of the 31st March, says:—With the death of John Bright an unique figure has been removed from the political life of England. Politics were not with him a trade for the advancement of self. He was a man of noble aims and far-reaching sympathy. His utterances on questions of Indian Government, whatever opinions may be formed of his views on particular points, disclose, in the light of subsequent events, a rare prescience breathing ever the same spirit of justice and humanity to the races that have been brought under British rule; and the intelligent among the people of India are grateful to the tribune of the people for his championship in days that have long gone by—in days before Fawcett entered political life, and, by his mastery of the questions of Indian administration and finance, earned for himself the proud title of "Member for India."

7. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 31st March, writes:—Mr. Bright always kept a corner in his great heart for India. In his manhood, when he took great interest in public business, Mr. Bright's voice was always heard pleading the cause of this poor country. It is a pity that in his maturer age, when he had earned the esteem of all, he ceased to take any active part in public affairs. Otherwise he could have rendered us immense assistance. However it must be a satisfaction, though a melancholy one, to the people to feel that the Indian National Congress of about fifteen hundred men from different parts of the country conveyed to Mr. Bright and his family their sense of the high value of his services to India. [The death of Mr. John Bright is deeply regretted by the entire vernacular press.]

A suggestion to reduce the emoluments of the Viceroy's office.

8. The Nyáyă Sindhu (46), in its issue of the 1st April, approves of the action of the Government of India and the local Governments in reducing expenditure and suggests that the emoluments of the Viceroy's office be considerably reduced, as that office is sought now-a-days by English statesmen more for its importance and honour than for the pecuniary attractions it affords.

A suggestion to cut down the high salaries of Indian officials.

9. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 31st March, referring to the remark of a writer in the Manchester Guardian that the struggle for what is called a respectable living is now so great—not in England only but also in her colonies—that the competition for Indian employment would not in any way be affected if the pay of all grades and branches of the Indian service were cut down 25 per cent., thus observes :—If this view of the matter be correct, then it will be criminal on the part of those who are responsible for the finances of India to neglect this consideration. Great efforts are being made to economise. What economy could be more effective than the reduction of salaries? If the reduction of salaries enable Government to cancel the increase in the odious salt-duty or abolish it altogether, how the people will bless it!

The budget statement for 1889-90 commented upon.

10. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 1st April, has the following remarks on the financial statement introduced by Sir David Barbour :—Sir David Barbour's first budget statement will be memorable as affording the first indication of a willing disposition on the part of the Government to effect reforms in the constitution of the Indian Legislative Councils. It gives a budget by no means prosperous or hopeful. The revenues of the country have been growing yearly, but in regard to expenditure Government seem to be acting on the supposition that the powers of growth of the revenues are unlimited, and from year to year there is a race between the figures of revenue and expenditure, each year the latter outstripping the former. Indian financiers are indeed always speaking hopefully. In the present statement too, notwithstanding its perpetual deficits, Sir D. Barbour is by no means despondent and our earnest wish is that his hopefulness may be well-founded. But we fear this eternal faith in the growing capacity of Indian revenue and expenditure will sooner or later bring matters to a crisis and then no expedients or makeshifts will save the Government. Sir D. Barbour mentions four hopeful elements in Indian finance, viz., (1) the elasticity of the sources of revenue, (2) decreasing expenditure in Burma, (3) decreasing expenditure on the army, frontier railways, and frontier and coast defences, and (4) the prosperity of the country by the growth of the indigenous industries in cotton and iron. But it is scarcely necessary to point out how unstable and uncertain each one of these grounds of hope is. However much we may wish it, no improvement in Indian finance is attainable so long as the present system of reckless finance continues. If it is to go on unimpeded the result is awful to contemplate. The finances of this country will be in a prosperous condition if the dangers arising from war and exchange are to cease. But as far as human probabilities go, there is no prospect of those dangers ceasing.

11. The Rást Goftár (82), in its issue of the 31st March, writes :—Sir David Barbour may fairly be congratulated on having presented a financial statement which, albeit tame and almost colourless, still possesses the two negative merits, not to be despised in these days of chronic embarrassment of the Indian treasury, of avoiding fresh taxation and incurring a deficit. The budget for the coming year is remarkable for its extreme sobriety and lucidity, which used to be more or less sacrificed by his civilian predecessors in the office in the pursuit of artistic effects and sophistical optimism.

There is no attempt at wordpainting and gloss in which the imagination of Sir Richard Temple found fitting occupation. Neither is it sprinkled with the rhetorical saw-dust which served the double purpose of throwing dust in the public eye and concealing the indubitable sterility of that luminary in matters of State finance. Nor has Sir David cared to imitate the questionable tactics of the Indian Castor and Pollux. He has not astounded us with the dazzling feats of financial jugglery after the fashion of the Strachey brothers. Appalling deficits have not been dressed up in the guise of fat surpluses, only to be proved, at the very first touch of honest criticism, to be so many woeful willow-the-wisps to worry and harass the mute tax-payers. It might have been ridiculous to continue the "prolonged wail" of Sir Auckland Colvin on the silver question, after Sir David's active participation in the labours of the Currency Commission, and Sir David has thus far exercised wise discretion in refusing to don the mantle of the Jeremiah of Indian silver problem. He has also sternly discarded the ambitious manner of Mr. Westland, who tried to sandwich last year's statement with a plentiful crop of what were termed by the unctuous section of the Anglo-Indian press as "monographs" on the principal heads of revenue and expenditure. Evidently the excellent company he kept for nearly a year with his distinguished colleagues of the Royal Currency Commission has had its salutary effect on the mind of our present Finance Minister. It is only in the company of the tritons that the minnows discover their own littleness. Sir David has learned much within the last twelve months which will stand him in good stead in the responsible position he now occupies. And one of the principal effects of his association with colleagues like Lord Herschell, Sir T. H. Farrer, Mr. Montague and others, is the reflex of sobriety and fair-mindedness which pervades his first financial exposition. The country will be relieved to find that, if there has been no reduction of the salt-duty on the one hand, there has been no fresh taxation on the other. It would be thus perceived that the broad fact which is to be noticed in the budget under review is the shuffling of the cards of provincial surpluses. Without the adjustments referred to, which, by the way, are not final—the luckless Provincial Governments being informed that there is to be a further raid on their already straitened resources—there would have been a deficit of half a kror. Now, these recurring deficits are the most disquieting feature of Indian finance. And in the face of the appalling deficits during the last three years and the cruel spoliation of provincial revenues, Sir David would have us confide in the stability of Indian finance! Just look at the net result of the mischievous foreign and military policy of the Indian Government which, we emphasise, is the sole cause of the financial embarrassments of this country. In round numbers there has been an aggregate deficit of 5½ krors in three years, besides the swallowing up of the annual grant of 1½ kror for famine and protective works and the revenue derived from additional taxation imposed during the same period. It will be thus perceived that it is the foreign and military policy of the empire which dominates the entire finance of India from year to year. And we would in this place strongly urge on our leading politicians, who more or less fritter away their energies in other less practical directions, to arouse themselves to a sense of the magnitude to which the tax-payers' moneys are annually sacrificed,—nay, absolutely squandered away,—on intangible military projects, the practical utility of which is wholly problematical, and agitate for a reversal of this insane policy. How much might the people have been benefited, for instance, by a judicious expenditure on the education of the masses of half of the 14 or 15 krors sunk in frontier railways and other hazardous and profitless enterprises, contrived by the cunning of the military hierarchy at Simla! And what a tower of strength would the educated masses represent in years to come! We take their combined strength as so many hundreds of millions of bayonets, rifles and guns to withstand that bugbear of Russian aggression. Though the effect of the budget is for the time assuring, and though the Indian Government has mercifully allowed some breathing time to the tax-payers, there is no saying when the militant tax-eaters may raise another scare and organise half-a-dozen other so-called punitive expeditions on the confines of the Hindu-Koosh, Nepaul, the Shan States and other borders, and further engulf the resources of the empire, adding fresh elements to the present discontent of the people. Sir David Barbour, as a civilian, is so conjured by the ghost of fresh military activity raised by his colleagues on the Imperial Council that he actually takes care in a guarded and cautious way to apprise the public in the 7th paragraph of his statement that it would be idle to expect that any finality has yet been reached in the military policy of the Government.

12. The Gujaráti (77), in its issue of the 31st March, says:—We are very grateful to Sir David Barbour for the arrangements which have placed the financial statement for 1889-90 in the possession of the entire public of India simultaneously with its publication in Calcutta. It is not always very easy or interesting to go through a complicated statement dealing with the financial position of a vast country like India; but the praiseworthy attempt that has been made this time at simplification and lucid exposition of the subject has, we think, remarkably succeeded. The deficits of nearly two krors in 1887-88 and twenty lákhs in 1888-89 are clearly explained by the expenditure incurred in various directions, especially on special defence works. Those of us, however, who look upon the contentment and prosperity of the subject-people as the greatest bulwark against Russian aggression are not likely to be quite satisfied with this heavy expenditure on the north-west frontier. The nominal surplus of nearly ten lákhs for 1889-90 is, as everyone knows, the result of the contributions loyally, but reluctantly, made by the Provincial Governments, even at the risk of hampering their own progress, for the sake of maintaining the solvency of the Indian Exchequer. Sir David Barbour's sanguine temperament naturally leads him to take a cheerful view of the future of Indian finance. But we are not sure that we can honestly congratulate the Government or the country on its financial situation as disclosed by the lucid financial statement. This year it was submitted to free and intelligent discussion in the Viceregal Council, but we are not yet in a position to say whether fuller light was thrown on the subject. This change has long been looked for, and Lord Dufferin deserves the grateful thanks of the entire Native community for recommending the introduction of this salutary innovation, which is in our judgment destined to influence the future financial policy of the Government, if only the representatives of the Indian public discharge the sacred trust reposed in them with that knowledge and ability, integrity and independence of character, which alone ought to be a qualification to entitle a person to a seat in the highest Council in the Indian Empire.

13. The Kannadá Suvárte (142), in its issue of the 5th April, writes:—It is indeed a source of great satisfaction to find that the financial outlook of the coming year is somewhat hopeful, and that the people have this year not been threatened with the imposition of a new tax for the purpose of filling up the gap in the Imperial treasury. Hitherto we have been accustomed to financial budgets which exhibited enormous deficits and which contained considerably intricate statistics that often repelled even the most patient reader or listener. But we are glad to find that Sir David Barbour, with his varied experience, has well succeeded in placing before the public a clear and glowing picture of the financial situation, free from any false colours that characterised some of the statements of his predecessors. When we consider that the highest ambition of an Indian Finance Minister is only to make the two ends of the budget meet, such a hopeful situation cannot but afford us a pleasant prospect. And it is but natural that such a result should be considered as an "agreeable surprise," especially when the successive deficits of the previous years had almost blighted all hopes of financial equilibrium. But encouraging as the position of future finance seems, we can by no means share all the views of Sir David Barbour with regard to it. "There are," says he, "hopeful as well as discouraging elements, and I may say at once that in my judgment there are no grounds for a despairing or pessimistic view of Indian finance." It is not possible for us to subscribe freely to this view. Sir David himself has pointed out that the special difficulties with which the Indian Finance Minister has to contend are war, famine and the dwindling in value of the rupee. Can any one safely, we ask, commit himself to any positive opinion on these questions? It passes our comprehension to guess as to when the petty frontier wars would give rest to the Indian taxpayers. His Excellency the Viceroy told us in a speech in the Council that the new British Burma is entirely surrounded by warlike tribes who live only upon plunder and booty. It will severely tax all the energies of the British soldiers to effect anything like a quiet on the frontier. With respect to famine and the fall in exchange, it is equally absurd to anticipate any good results. It is however true that in the absence of these contending difficulties the finances would not fail to show signs of prosperity, and it must be admitted that in these days of continued embarrassment a financial equilibrium is sure to relieve the anxiety of the overtaxed people of this country, who will not, we presume, lose this opportunity of thanking the Finance Minister for having given them a short time to breathe freely.

Discussion on the budget estimate criticized.

14. In noticing the discussion on the budget estimate, the Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 1st April, says:—The concession of subjecting the budget annually to a discussion in the Supreme Legislative Council deserves to be hailed with joyous acclamations, and there is little doubt that the Councillors will do far better in future than what they have done this year. The Native members of the Council have duly represented Native public opinion in regard to the income-tax and the salt-duty, viz., that the income-tax should be imposed on landholders, that military men like the civil population should be brought under its incidence, that the limit of exemption from the tax should be raised to annual incomes of one thousand rupees, and that the rate of taxation should be increased in proportion to the largeness of the income. The Honourable Mr. Steel expressed an opinion that the working of the salt-duty was satisfactory and ridiculed the idea of the poverty of the masses, but this he did evidently in gross ignorance of the actual condition of the country.

Remarks made in connection with the salt-duty at the discussion on the budget estimate disapproved.

15. The Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 3rd April, says:—On account of a misstatement made in the telegraphic news about the discussion on the budget estimate, it was asserted by us that the Native members of the Council recommended the repeal of the recent increase in the salt-duty, but the fact is that none of them made such a recommendation; on the other hand, the Honourable Rája Durga Charan Lala denied that the salt-duty was either harassing or oppressive, and remarked that if taxes were to be removed he hoped the income-tax would be the first to go. These views of the Rája are mistaken and not in unison with those entertained by the Native public. The natural inclination of the Secretary of State for India must be to increase and not to decrease taxation; but since Lord Cross has admitted the necessity of repealing the recent increase in the salt-duty His Lordship must have been convinced of the desirability of taking that step by authoritative information and statistics on the subject. The recommendation made by the Rája to repeal the income-tax in preference to the salt-duty means that relief is to be given to the well-to-do, overlooking the claims of the poor, which is evidently not a sound principle. The part taken by the Honourable Rája in the discussion on the budget estimate once more proves the inadaptability of the nomination system and the desirability of introducing popular representation in the Indian Legislative Councils. [The Satyavakta (129), in its issue of the 5th April, expresses similar sentiments, strongly recommends Government to increase the present rate of the income-tax in order to enable them to reduce the salt-duty with a view to give some relief to the poor, and adds that incomes under Rs. 1,000 a year should be exempted from the operation of the income-tax as suggested by the Honourable Mr. Amir Husen, and that the zamindárs and military officers, who are at present exempted from it, should be brought under its operation.]

Comments on the remarks made by His Excellency Lord Lansdowne with regard to the right of interpellation in Indian Legislative Councils.

16. Referring to the remarks of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne on the right of interpellation, the Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 1st April, writes:—The limitations which His Lordship desires to impose on the exercise of the right are not unacceptable to the most ardent advocates of the measure. The right of refusing to answer a question when the reply would prejudice public interests is undeniably vested in the Executive Government even in England. No one has ever dreamt here of asking any greater privileges. We are quite willing that all inconvenient questions of foreign policy should be excluded from the purview of interpellation. But what we desire is that the privilege should be granted with just such limitations as Government may see fit to impose. As in the case of the budget, so in regard to the right of interpellation the reform should be extended to the Provincial Councils. The extension of this reform is necessary as much in the interests of the Government as of the people. It is as desirable for the Government to set right popular notions about its intentions as for the people to know what Government propose to do in particular cases. Lord Dufferin had some bitter experience of the evils arising from the absence of an opportunity for Government to speak out its own mind and to disabuse the people of unfounded apprehensions and prejudices. On both the points here referred to, we mean, the discussion of the budget and the right of interpellation, Lord Dufferin, it is very pleasing to note, held very favourable views, and we are glad that His Lordship's advocacy has so far prevailed that the first is already an accomplished fact, and that with respect to the second we have got such an assurance from the present Viceroy that we are encouraged to hope that the reform will not be long delayed.

The proposed concession of the annual discussion of the budget estimate and the right of interpellation in the Supreme Legislative Council commented upon.

17. In noticing that part of His Excellency the Viceroy's speech at the discussion of the budget estimate wherein His Excellency announced that the Secretary of State for India had expressed his concurrence in the proposal that there should be an annual discussion on the budget in the Council and that the right of interpellation should under certain limits be conceded to its members, the Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 1st April, says:—Under the proposed limits the right of interpellation would be quite worthless, inasmuch as Government would not allow such questions to be put as would be unpleasant to it, and would exercise the office of judging what questions are injurious to the public interests, it being well-known that the views entertained by Government on the subject are opposed to public opinion and interest. The announcement made by His Excellency on this subject is, however, gratifying in so far as it shows that the authorities here as well as in England are convinced of the necessity for effecting a reform in the Imperial Legislative Council, and that the demands of the Indian public and the Indian National Congress on the subject are, in spite of the misrepresentations of their opponents, quite loyal, and that this admission, coming as it does from such a Viceroy as His Excellency Lord Lansdowne under the régime of the Conservative Ministry, is a victory of Indian public opinion. Since the authorities admit the necessity for a reform of the Legislative Councils, there is no use in adopting half measures that will not satisfy the people.

Remarks on the Earl of Dufferin's proposals about the reform of the Indian Legislative Councils.

18. The Rást Goftár (82), in its issue of the 31st March, says:—The private minute of Lord Dufferin containing proposals for the reconstitution of the Indian Legislative Councils has leaked out. A document of this nature, which is not intended by its author for publication, is of special importance, inasmuch as the writer gives in it unreservedly his inner thoughts, which he does not think himself called upon to disclose to the public. The ex-Viceroy's scheme does not contemplate any radical change in the constitution of the Legislative Councils. There should be no cause for complaint if the changes were effected on the lines indicated in the minute. His Lordship wishes that the educated classes and the mercantile interests should be represented in the Councils, and we think that a beginning in this direction may be made by allowing the Chambers of Commerce, the Universities and the political associations of recognised status in India to elect a limited number of their representatives for the Councils. Some of our patriots would have the number to be fifty, or even a hundred, in each Council. We hardly think it would either add to the dignity of the Councils or the value of the deliberations held there, if the executive were confronted with an opposition—for such it will be—so formidable in number. Another change recommended in the procedure of the Supreme Legislative Council is that its members should be permitted to ask questions in reference to current matters of domestic interest. The proposal is excellent, though the ground on which it is chiefly recommended will not meet with the approval of the entire Native press. Lord Dufferin evidently wrote this while he was smarting under the affronts and cavillings that were being hurled at him by some Native newspapers of Bengal. The observations of His Lordship regarding these newspapers are not quite ill deserved. We are sorry for the cause which has led to the proposal of introducing the change in the Council. But if it were adopted, it would be hailed by the public as a welcome and salutary reform.

19. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 31st March, writes:—It will hardly do to despise the concession—such, at any rate, it is intended to be made by His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's Government—with regard to the discussion of the Indian budget in the Council. Small though this instalment be, and hedged round by "safeguards," it marks a step towards investing the Supreme Legislative Council with a voice in an important sphere of administration. The budget will henceforth be discussed by members of the Legislative as well as of the Executive Council. His Excellency the Viceroy announces this concession with the concurrence of the Secretary of State for India. We may congratulate the different public associations in India, notably the Chambers of Commerce, upon the success of their representations so far, and wait to see how the Indian National Congress looks at the matter at its fifth annual meeting.

20. The Suryodayă (63), in its issue of the 1st April, commenting on the proposals of Lord Dufferin for reconstituting the Legislative Councils of India, remarks:—The concessions recommended by His Lordship to be given to the people of this country do not go far enough. They are worthless and under the rigorous restrictions proposed little good can be expected to result. What is the use of criticism and examination of the financial policy of the Government when those who criticise and examine it cannot vote either way on the budget submitted to them? It is simply a dodge played by Lord Dufferin to shut for the present the mouths of Indian agitators and shelve the question for the moment.

21. Referring to His Excellency the Viceroy's speech in the Supreme Legislative Council during the debate on the budget statement, the Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 1st April, observes:—We have an assurance from His Excellency Lord Lansdowne, as clear as words can make it, that the discussion of the budget in the Council will be an annual institution, not depending upon the adventitious circumstance of an increase or decrease of taxation, but to be done as a matter of course. Now all that remains to be done in this matter is that this excellent example of the Supreme Government should be followed by the Provincial Governments in regard to their own budgets. At present the provincial budgets are only published in the official Gazette in the form of a brief account statement. If the budget of the Government of India will gain by the criticism to which it will be subjected in the Supreme Legislative Council, there is no reason to think that the provincial budgets will not gain likewise by a full and free discussion in the respective Provincial Legislative Councils.

22. The Gujaráti (77), in its issue of the 31st March, says:—We are really glad to see that the Times of India has given its support to the demand now and then put forward by the Native press and the Indian National Congress for the concession of the right of interpellation. We are quite at one with our contemporary that many of the blunders and unconscious misrepresentations in the Native press are due to the absence of any effective machinery for setting aright public opinion in regard to any important subject. If the wishes of the thoughtful public were generously met in this matter, the conduct of Government would be less open to captious and unjust criticism and the Native press would find no justification for believing in uncharitable allegations. The concession of the right will have a direct influence in elevating the tone of Native journalism throughout India and in enhancing the credit of British rule.

Comments on the announcement about the budget being discussed in the Supreme Legislative Council.

23. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 27th March, says:—The announcement that the budget will be discussed in the Supreme Legislative Council is the most satisfactory corrective of the impression which was allowed to go abroad that the present Viceroy was not inclined to look upon such a proposal with favour. Whatever His Excellency's personal opinion may be,—and into this we need not too curiously enquire,—he has shown no signs of going back upon the lines of his predecessors in office on a subject of this nature, which does not involve any of the sectional and other difficulties which are said to beset several other reforms on the tapis. A rough draft of the budget, it is now reported, has been printed, and is being circulated among the members of the Supreme Legislative Council. If it is allowed to be debated in full Council it will be a wholly novel and distinct departure, and will mark a red-letter day in the history of the progress of the Council. Not only will this step be in unison with public feeling throughout the country, but it will be a distinct advantage to Government. For, while the chances of the budget being materially altered by any amount of discussion are infinitesimally small, it will enable Government to face their critics with a better grace, and to share the responsibility, although nominally, of framing the estimates of State expenditure with those who take part in legislating for the Empire.

Earl of Dufferin's proposals for the reform of the Indian Legislative Councils considered a result of the Indian National Congress movement and His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's expected statement about them awaited with great interest.

24. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 30th March, says:—Whether we accept the Earl of Dufferin's proposals regarding the reform of the Indian Legislative Councils in their entirety or not, we must feel grateful to him that he so far yielded to public opinion and expressed his readiness to go a step further. Those who have been trying to calculate the net result of the Indian National Congress will be now able to acknowledge that it has not been altogether a useless movement. It is stated that before the Legislative Council in Calcutta breaks up to meet at Simla, His Excellency Lord Lansdowne will make a brief statement in regard to the proposals made by the ex-Viceroy. It is scarcely necessary to say that Lord Lansdowne's statement will be awaited with the greatest interest.

Sir John Gorst's reply in connection with the Indian National Congress publications approved.

25. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 1st April, observes:—Sir John Gorst's reply to the agitators against the Indian National Congress in reference to the Congress publications was a good slap in their face. Any other reply would have been contrary to the genius of the British people. Men like Mr. Maclean, M. P., would fain like to see the Congress and all its activity suppressed by main force. But the Congress has greater vitality than its opponents are aware of. The Congress publications may contain a little bit of exaggeration here and there, but they are by no means seditious. The Congress movement has been pronounced to be loyal by such unbiassed witnesses as Mr. Caine, M. P. Besides, the people to whom the publications are addressed, at all events those who read them, are sufficiently discerning, and there is little danger of their losing their head. Our reading public is very small and Government need apprehend no danger from that small reading class.

The circular of the Government of India prohibiting their servants from taking part in collecting subscriptions for political movements commented upon.

26. The Gujarát Mitră (78), in its issue of the 31st March, says:—Whatever some of our contemporaries may think, it cannot be said that the Government of India has overstepped its duty in prohibiting its own officials from unreservedly joining irresponsible, but public-spirited, persons in obtaining money or influence in furthering political objects which the Government itself may not publicly and emphatically approve of. The best of governments will only become contemptible and a laughing-stock, if an enthusiastic assemblage, which demands revolution in governmental systems, was actively supported by a body of servants who eat the salt of that government and whose discipline and interests they are expected honourably to uphold and advance. But it is no part of the duty of a State functionary to find resources for carrying on an embarrassing campaign of such a character against a civilized government which feels it treasonable to suppress the public press and the public associations, which indeed afford the requisite ventilation to the vast and complicated State edifice. The function belongs entirely to a different and opposite class of persons; the people themselves are sufferers if their specific service is in any way demoralized and enfeebled. An enlightened view should be taken of the step taken by His Excellency Lord Lansdowne, whether it is his first, or second, or of any period, it does not matter in the least.

27. The Shri Shiváji (60), in its issue of the 29th March, condemns the recent circular issued by Government prohibiting its servants from taking any part or giving any help to any political movement in this country, as it is calculated to defeat the ends of all good governments, namely, a close understanding between the rulers and the ruled, and remarks that all political movements in this country have in view the object of aiding Government and not opposing it. It adds that the circular in question strikes at the very root of such an object and should therefore be cancelled.

28. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 30th March, says:—The Government of India have issued a circular to the local Governments drawing their attention to the practice that prevails among some officials of raising money for political purposes without the sanction of their official superiors, and pointing out that such a practice is extremely objectionable. It is needless to say that this will be widely interpreted as an attitude of impartiality, not very far removed from armed neutrality, towards the Indian National Congress. Interpreted in the letter, of course, it does not bear any such meaning. It implies neutrality quite as much towards Sir Syed Ahmed's movement as towards the Congress. But the time at which the circular has been issued is rather significant. If officials have been connected with any political movement more than with another, it is with Sir Syed Ahmed's. We would not be very wide of the mark if we were to say that the opposition movement was regarded almost as the official movement. This circular of the Government of India should have been issued earlier. Sir Syed Ahmed's movement has received contributions from Native States and other places where some misunderstanding might have been avoided if the attitude of the Government had been explained earlier. We understand that the Government of India did explain to the Native Princes their position, but whether it was after or before Sir Syed Ahmed's appeal we are not quite certain. At the present time the old politician of Aligarh is displaying no activity, but the circular of the Government of India can really apply to that movement alone. We have not heard of any instances of Government officials trying to raise money for the Congress. Individual officials may have paid their share, but this cannot be stopped. Most of the funds were raised and paid by people who had nothing to do with the Government service. Just now the Englishman newspaper has been ventilating what it no doubt thinks a flagrant attempt at "raising the wind." Mr. Hume is reported to have interviewed many pleaders in Bengal and to have asked them to raise money for the Congress. This clearly falls outside the scope of the circular. The leaders of the Congress will try to raise subscriptions throughout the country if need be, but it is not quite clear how it can discredit the movement.

Mr. Lee-Warner's advice to the natives of India regarding political movements.

29. In writing about Mr. Lee-Warner's recent lecture on selection, the Gujaráti (77), in its issue of the 31st March, says:—The observations of Mr. Lee-Warner, and the expectations of other Englishmen to which he refers, are founded entirely on a misconception of the whole situation, and the critics themselves fall victims to fallacies similar to those which they endeavour to clear for the benefit of others. The advice that Mr. Lee-Warner gave to his young audience was certainly very excellent; but the only pity is that his want of sympathy and the aggressive character of some portions of his speech were not calculated to impress the lessons which he wished to inculcate upon the minds of his hearers. "My first advice to you," said Mr. Lee-Warner, "is to be tolerant of opposition." Was it consistent or dignified on his part, then, to speak of associations sticking up sign-boards on which "Sárvajanik Sabha" or "Patent Universal Assembly" is written? This is neither sincerity nor genuine sympathy, but a little-minded desire to ridicule the new manifestations of a developing national sentiment, which does small credit to his heart and is scarcely praiseworthy in a high official who poses as an honest and candid adviser to the rising generation. The entire Native community is indebted to him for whatever good advice he has given; but at the same time it has a right to remind him of what Burke and Prof. Darmesteter have said regarding the sentiment of sympathy. Genuine sympathy, according to the former, is a healing and cementing principle, which alone, in the opinion of the French savant, will cause the crushing ascendancy of British rulers, who seemed to him wanting in that sentiment, to be forgiven.

The Hon'ble K. T. Telang's telegram to the London Times on the subject of the Crawford case approved.

30. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 27th March, says:—With reference to the leading article which appeared in the Times on the Crawford case, the Honourable Mr. Telang telegraphed a protest to Mr. Digby, who sent it on to the Times for publication. The Honourable Mr. Telang very temperately protests against the attempt to mislead the English people on the subject. It has now become a characteristic feature of the Times to express deliberate convictions on very scanty information, and its remarks on the Crawford Commission had no other basis than the information supplied by its Calcutta correspondent. Mr. Telang is perfectly right when he says that the public faith in the Bombay Government has not been shaken and that the sympathies of the country have been with the Government all along the line in their resolute attempt to do what is right.

Separation of judicial and executive functions recommended.

31. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 1st April, writes:—Now that some of the Mámlatdárs have had their magisterial powers suspended, may we suggest to Government to try the experiment of a separation of judicial and executive functions? The extreme desirability of the reform is not questioned. It is delayed in consequence of the difficulty of funds. The present is, we believe, an excellent opportunity for making the experiment on a small scale. The Mámlatdárs with the suspended powers must be exercising their revenue and executive functions alone and some extra provision must have been made, we take it, for their judicial work. Perhaps a more satisfactory reform may, we think, be made by investing the Subordinate Judges with criminal powers. Just as the Assistant and District Judges have both civil and criminal functions, the Subordinate Judges may, we believe, be trusted to do both civil and criminal work. The change will add to the work of the Subordinate Judges, but when they are over-worked they may be relieved by appointing a few additional Subordinate Judges. But the Judges being better trained to law and the discrimination of evidence will, we think, do the work more satisfactorily, whereas the Mámlatdárs will be free to do their multifarious executive work more efficiently. The additional cost of appointing the additional Subordinate Judges may, we think, be covered by the saving which may result from a more equal distribution of the executive charges of the Mámlatdárs. After they are relieved of their magisterial duties there will occur a great reduction in their work under the present arrangements. A redistribution of work will save a post or two, which may be utilized in providing for the Subordinate Judges. Even if the experiment should lead to some increased cost, we think it is worth a trial.

32. The same newspaper again refers to the alleged Bhyndar jobbery and observes:—We have been credibly informed that the value of the land which was made a free gift of by Government to Abdul Gaffur amounts to about Rs. 10,000. As a further measure of the interest which Government have so lightly passed away may be mentioned the fact that the plaintiff in the case before the Bombay High Court values his one year's profits, if we mistake not, at Rs. 15,000. It is difficult to conceive that such an act should be possible under the British Government, that it should have been committed by some of the highest officers, and that it should have passed off unchallenged so long. There is a great deal of noise made over the failings of the poor Mámlatdárs in the Crawford case. They are pronounced to be unfit to hold judicial posts, because they failed to show sufficient moral firmness under certain trying circumstances. But what must be said of the high European officers who have violated the public trust and acted in disregard of all considerations of justice and equity in order to please a favourite? Will our Anglo-Indian contemporaries, who are so fond of airing their superiority, note this and call for an enquiry?

The ábkári circular about the possession of mowra flowers commented upon.

33. The same newspaper writes:—As an illustration of how mischievous the ábkári circular against the possession of mowra flowers may prove in its operation, we mention a case which has recently come up before the Bombay High Court. One Káshináth Tátya, inhabitant of a village named Vadnavghar in the Bhiwndi Táluka of the Thána District, purchased some time ago three sacks of mowra flowers at Bhiwndi for the purpose of feeding his cattle and was taking them to his village. On the way he was arrested and placed before the first-class Magistrate of Bhiwndi, who forthwith convicted the accused under Section 43 of the Ábkári Act and fined him Rs. 100. The aggrieved person has come up to the High Court under the extraordinary jurisdiction and has applied for setting aside the conviction and sentence. The High Court has sent for the record and proceedings of the case. The case is sub-judice, and we must refrain from making any observations on its merits. But judging by the affidavits filed on behalf of the petitioner, he seems to have received considerable rough treatment at the hands of the prosecutors.

The conduct of Mr. Candy, Collector of Sholápur, in rejecting a Bráhman candidate's application for employment in the public service and his remark thereon approved.

34. The Din Bandhu (7), in its issue of the 31st March, approves of the action of Mr. Candy, Collector of Sholápur, in rejecting a Bráhman candidate's application for employment with the remark that according to rules non-Bráhmans have first claims on Government service, and advocates the desirability of making a hard and fast rule to that effect if no such rule has yet been made, as the Bráhmanical class has monopolised all the places in Government service and has hindered the progress of the other classes. Fitness, continues the paper, should be the test for entering the public service, and an impartial Government like the present should be doing an unjust thing if it recognised any other test.

Parties given to Mr. and Mrs. Sheppard at Surat and Mr. Crawley-Boevey, the Collector of that town.

35. In a news-letter from Surat, the Rást Goftár (82) of the 31st March states that Mr. Crawley-Boevey, the local Collector, has raised an objection in the matter of the parties given to Mr. Sheppard, Commissioner, N. D., and his wife, by several gentlemen in that town on the eve of their departure from India, that he thinks that these parties are public parties, and that he therefore did not attend any one of them.

Suggestions regarding the appointment of a successor to the late Colonel Watson, Political Agent, Káthiáwár.

36. The Káthiáwár Times (81), in its issue of the 31st March, says:—No better selection could be made than the appointment of Colonel Wodehouse, C.I.E., the present Political Agent, Kolhápur, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Colonel Watson. We do not want a new hand. We want one who has got a good deal of experience of Káthiáwár. Since 1873 Colonel Wodehouse has been much connected with this province, and has filled eminent appointments with great credit. Colonel Wodehouse can claim the Káthiáwár Agency by right, and we sincerely hope that His Excellency the Governor will not overlook it. [The Ahmedabad Times (85), in its issue of the 2nd April, recommends the appointment of a man like Mr. Crawley-Boevey, Collector of Surat, to the post of Political Agent, Káthiáwár, and thereby to put an end to the intrigues prevailing in that province and the sufferings of the people.]

A complaint against the Political Agent, Rewa Kántha.

37. The Rájyabhakt (126), in its issue of the 2nd April, disapproves of the Political Agent, Rewa Kántha, having recently had a bhavái performance (music and dancing) enacted at Vadnagar, as stated by the Baroda Vatsal newspaper, and remarks that Government should take severe notice of the Political Agent for witnessing a low performance, which is hated by all sensible men.

38. The Yajdán Parast (141), in its issue of the 31st March, expresses satisfaction with the sanction given by Government for presenting Ráo Bahádur Dájiba Gangáji, of the Bombay police, with a sword of the value of Rs. 200, as recommended by Colonel Wilson, the Commissioner of Police, praises the Ráo Bahádur, and adds that the present of a golden armlet or land would be a proper reward for his long and valuable services, that the late head of the Bombay detective police, Khán Bahádur Akbar Ali, received a reward of the latter kind, and that the Ráo Bahádur's services are in no way inferior to those of Khán Bahádur Akbar Ali. [The Pársi Punch (122), in its issue of the same date, observes that it would have been very glad if some substantial present had been made by Government to Ráo Bahádur Dájiba Gangáji.]

Ráo Bahádur Dájiba Gangáji of the Bombay police and the presentation of a sword to him by Government.

39. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 27th March, says:—We earnestly hope that during his brief stay at Karáchi His Excellency Lord Reay will find time to make a personal enquiry into the case of Mr. Khushirám Khatanmal, the Acting Registrar of the Small Cause Court at Karáchi. So far as we are aware, the case is one of extreme hardship and alien to the spirit of British justice, and we hope that Lord Reay being on the spot will see that justice is done.

A request to His Excellency Lord Reay to enquire into the case of the Acting Registrar of the Small Cause Court, Karáchi.

40. The Bombay Samáchár (91), the Jáme Jamshed (108) and the Akhbáre Sodágar (87), in their respective issues of the 6th April, express regret that rain-betting has been held by the Bombay High Court in an appeal case not to constitute gaming under Bombay Act IV of 1887, describe the evils of rain-betting and request Government to take legislative action for the effectual suppression of the evil. [A correspondent writes to the Rást Goftár (82) of the 31st March to say that Mr. Narotamdás, the manager of rain-betting in Bombay, has already rented the old site near Mumbádevi for Rs. 6,900 from Mr. Panálál Punamchand in order to commence business there from 1st June next.]

Legislative action prayed for for the suppression of the evil of rain-betting in Bombay.

41. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 30th March, says:—Healy and Warner, the two European convicts who recently escaped under very sensational circumstances from the Presidency Jail in Calcutta and were subsequently arrested by a plucky Bengali police officer, have been let off by the Chief Magistrate with a week's hard labour each. This has apparently caused some surprise, as it was generally expected that the prisoners would be committed to the criminal sessions. The Magistrate justifies his leniency on the ground that the jail authorities are primarily to blame, because although repeatedly warned they never took any effectual means to prevent Healy and Warner from making a successful attempt at escape. The temptation was strong, the carelessness of the warders and others was extraordinary, and so the men took their chance and escaped. This is rather a novel view to take, and the rigour of criminal law would be considerably modified if such an extenuating circumstance were taken into consideration. A thief seldom learns his trade unless temptations are placed in his way, and so on in almost every case in which the law is broken. The fortunate culprits will hardly profit by the lesson unless they have realised the hopelessness of escaping out of the country, however it may be easy to escape out of the jail. As for the jail authorities, they must have known after reading the Magistrate's scathing remarks that there is a rod in pickle for them.

Criticism on the alleged leniency of the sentence passed upon two European convicts who recently escaped from the Calcutta jail.

42. The Shubh Suchak (61), of Sátára, in its issue of the 29th March, calls the attention of the authorities to the corruption prevailing in the mofussil courts of justice. It says that the lower ministerial officers of the court, in the execution of their multifarious duties, are often suspected in that province to be given to the practice of taking illegal gratification from both plaintiffs and defendants—a state of things which causes very great hardship to the poor illiterate Kunbis who have business to do in the courts. It adds that Government should cause due enquiries to be made in this matter, as the complaint has been of long standing and has assumed very undesirable proportions.

Alleged corruption prevailing in mofussil law-courts among lower ministerial officers.

Mr. Pinhey's appointment as Fourth Judge, Small Cause Court, Bombay, approved.

43. The Yajdán Parast (141), in its issue of the 31st March, says that the Bombay Government is not to blame for not appointing Mr. Hormasji Dádábhái to the bench of the Bombay Small Cause Court in preference to one of their own worthy servants, approves of Mr. Pinhey's appointment as Fourth Judge, Small Cause Court, Bombay, and remarks that Mr. Pinhey will in all likelihood prove a useful and worthy Judge, as he has experience of the work.

Mr. Hakim's appointment as Judge of the Small Cause Court, Karáchi, approved.

44. The Rást Goftár (82), in its issue of the 31st March, approves of the appointment of Mr. Mahomed Husein Hakim as Judge of the Small Cause Court, Karáchi, and says that Mr. Hakim is an able man and his elevation to the bench will give satisfaction to the Mahomedan community at large. It remarks that the claims of Mr. Hormasji Dádábhái were not ignored by Government, as that gentleman was offered a seat on the Karáchi Small Cause Court which he for private reasons declined. Government therefore cannot be said to have acted unfairly towards that gentleman. [The Kaiser-i-Hind (112) of the 31st March and the Káside Mumbai (113) of the 1st April also approve of Mr. Hakim's appointment as doing justice to the Mahomedans.]

Appointment of Mr. Hakim as Judge of the Small Cause Court, Karáchi, disapproved.

45. The Gujaráti (77), in its issue of the 31st March, says:—We are really sorry that the claims of Mr. Hormasji Dádábhái, who gave complete satisfaction by his abilities and experience every time he served as an Acting Judge in the Small Cause Court, Bombay, have been completely ignored in the new arrangements, which will doubtless be gratifying at least to a portion of the Mahomedan community and especially to Mr. Hakim. We at once admit that our Mahomedan friends deserve every legitimate encouragement, but we fail to see anything special or remarkable in Mr. Hakim's abilities or experience as a justification for overruling the infinitely superior claims of such a worthy member of the bar as Mr. Hormasji Dádábhái. Quite recently Mr. Tágore's claims were similarly ignored, and we are certainly not prepared for this additional instance of justice under the enlightened régime of a Governor like His Excellency Lord Reay.

Mr. Hakim's appointment as Judge, Small Cause Court, Karáchi, and a suggestion to His Excellency Lord Reay.

46. The Rájyabhakt (126), in its issue of the 2nd April, says that the appointment of Mr. Hakim as Judge of the Small Cause Court, Karáchi, will be construed by the people as a reward for his opposition to the Indian National Congress. The paper, however, is of opinion that the appointment has been given to Mr. Hakim out of justice to the claims of the Mahomedans, hopes that His Excellency Lord Reay will give a clear hint to the public to that effect on some future occasion, and adds that it is already proved that a just Governor like Lord Reay is not opposed to the political progress of the people.

The recent Subordinate Judges' and District Pleaders' Examination held at Bombay.

47. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 31st March, writing about the results of the Subordinate Judges' and District Pleaders' Examination, observes:—What a horrible massacre this is! Only three succeed in passing out of one hundred! We have never seen a more dreadful result. This is literally a massacre of the innocents. Is it possible to believe that so many as 96 out of every hundred came unprepared or were unworthy of passing? Such a supposition is simply unnatural. We think the result is due to the whims of some extra-severe examiners. If our view be correct, then the best way to avoid a scandal would be for the Bombay High Court to call for the papers and get them examined by experienced examiners and then revise the results in the light of this re-examination. The matter is really serious and well worthy of the attention of the High Court. [A few other papers also complain of the highly unsatisfactory result of the examinations in question, and call the attention of the authorities concerned to the matter. The Yajdán Parast (141), in its issue of the 31st March, suggests that the standard of marks for passing the examination should be lowered to 50 per cent. and that care should be taken about the length and severity of the question-papers. The Ahmedabad Times (85), in its issue of the 2nd April, remarks that if Government think that the number of High Court and District Pleaders is already large, they should hold the examination every alternate year instead of annually, and thus save the poor candidates needless trouble and expense.]

48. The Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 1st April, calls the attention of the High Court of Bombay to the percentage of passes in the recent High Court Pleaders' Examination, remarks that the examiners were unusually severe this year, and hopes that the matter will be investigated by the Chief Justice and the Judges of the High Court.

The Surat District Board requested to open relief-works in aid of the distressed agricultural population.

49. The Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 5th April, says that distress prevails among the poor agricultural population in several parts of the Surat District, particularly in the Párdi, Bulsár and Mándvi Tálukás, on account of the failure of the later rains, that this distress is certain to increase as the hot season advances, that there is a long time between this and the next crop is gathered, and that cholera has already broken out in the district. The Jáme therefore hopes that the Surat District Board will at once open relief-works in the different parts of the district in the interests of the distressed.

Scarcity of water in Khándesh.

50. The Sudhákar (62), in its issue of the 30th March, states that Khándesh is suffering from a great scarcity of water, calls the attention of Government to the signs of distress appearing in the province, and suggests that early measures be adopted to ward off the impending danger.

Inconvenience suffered by passengers on board coasting steamers plying between Bombay and Ratnágiri.

51. The Bakul (22), in its issue of the 31st March, complains of the inconvenience which passengers on board coasting steamers plying between Ratnágiri and Bombay suffer through the carelessness and negligence of the steamer authorities, who have hitherto lent no ear to the representations made to them. It says that the passengers having taken tickets are obliged to wait sometimes for a week for a steamer which will carry them to their destination, and that they must trudge on to the bandar everyday in the heat of the sun to see whether a steamer has accommodation and can take them up. The paper attributes this negligence to want of competition, there being only one steamer company, and urges on Government to make immediate inquiries into this complaint of long standing and see that the poor passengers are better treated.

Segregation of lepers in Bombay suggested.

52. In noticing the long debate on the defective regulations concerning persons affected with leprosy in Bombay at the first meeting of the new Bombay Municipal Corporation, the Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 6th April, says:—The amendment moved by Mr. Bamanji Pestanji Master to the effect that Government be requested to take legislative action authorizing the police to remove lepers to an asylum to be built and maintained by the Corporation was appropriate and should have been adopted. In the absence of such an asylum, the action taken by the authorities will only remove the evil of leprosy from one place to another. If the Corporation be unwilling to undergo the expense of the asylum at once, the convenience afforded by the Allbless Leper Asylum at Trombay should be availed of. It is not right that Bombay should remain exposed to the evil of leprosy until a leper law is enacted by the Supreme Government for the whole of India, as it is not known when that will be done and of what nature that law would be. [The Jáme Jamshed (108) and the Akhbáre Sodágar (87), in their respective issues of the same date, express similar sentiments.]

Alleged discouragement of the work of the Native Military Orphanage by commanding officers.

53. The Pandit (159), in its issue of the 5th April, says:—We are sorry to find that some commanding officers are still trying to discourage our charitable work of supporting military orphans. We do not understand why they should do so, when others are encouraging it as far as they can. We have received a letter from one of our subscribers to the effect that he has been threatened by his commanding officer that he would be tried by a court-martial if he continued to subscribe to the Pandit. We hope the Government of His Excellency Lord Reay will make enquiries into the matter and ask the commanding officers not to discourage the cause of helpless orphans.

Imposition of a dog-tax in the military cantonments of the Bombay Presidency criticized.

54. In noticing the imposition of a dog-tax in the military cantonments of the Bombay Presidency except Aden, the Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 4th April, says:—The new tax is not likely to lessen the evil of hydrophobia, but will add a good round sum to cantonment funds. The execution of the order annually issued by the Commissioner of Police, Bombay, for the destruction of dogs straying on the public roads is also ineffectual in lessening the mischief committed by rabid dogs and hurts the feelings of a portion of the Native community and sometimes leads to the poisoning of quiet and well-behaved animals, whose owners are much irritated at the wanton destruction of their pets. The best remedy for the prevention of mischief by rabid dogs is the use of the muzzle, and it is certainly strange that the police do not compel owners of dogs to take the precaution of muzzling them.

The necessity for strengthening the Bombay police force.

55. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 4th April, refers to the paucity of the police force in Bombay, observes that there is a glaring disproportion between the population of the town and its police and that the present police force is totally inadequate for the purpose of protection, and urges on Government the necessity for sanctioning the proposals submitted to them by Colonel Wilson, the Commissioner of Police.

Complaint against the Kaira police.

56. The Svadesh Bandhu (136), in its issue of the 3rd April, complains of the increase in the number of murders in the Kaira District and of the dilatoriness of the local police in the discharge of their duties, which it thinks is due to want of proper supervision by the district authorities, says that thefts are frequently committed, and draws the attention of Government to the matter.

A complaint against the Mahudha police.

57. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 27th March, refers to the fire in the village of Undara, two miles from Mahudha, on the last Holi holiday, when about 22 houses were burnt down, complains of the local police having been remiss in the performance of their duty of helping to extinguish the fire though information was received by them in Mahudha only one hour after the occurrence, and remarks that if the Mahudha police had been present at the scene of fire, pillage would have been prevented.

The celebration of the Holi in Mahudha.

58. The same newspaper refers to the death in Mahudha of a sepoy named Nathu, who was struck with a brick on the face by some budmash on the last Holi holiday while the Holi procession was moving about, and says that pieces of wood were stolen by some evil persons on the occasion of the festival and that the celebration of the Holi should either be stopped or the leading persons should be required to furnish securities for good behaviour during the festival. It adds that the stoppage of the festival is not likely to wound the religious feelings of the people, but on the contrary will check immorality.

PART II.—Legislation.

Extension of the English Factories' Act to India disapproved and the philanthropy of Manchester merchants commented upon.

59. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 30th March, says:—Unless the mill-owners and employers of labour in this country look about them, and that also without any unnecessary loss of time, we are very much afraid that the English Factories' Act will be forced down the throat of this country in a very short time. There is a determined and deliberate attempt, under the veil of philanthropic and sympathetic feeling, inspired by men whose names need not be mentioned, to handicap the working of Indian mills and factories. The last Lancashire deputation that waited upon the Secretary of State for India on the 22nd instant threw off even this thin disguise of philanthropy and boldly demanded that the factory laws of India should be assimilated with those of England. Lord Cross tried to put a bold face on the matter, but he is not a very strong man, and if the Lancashire agitation spreads, it is possible that he may have to reconsider the question. Now there is every chance that the cry of free-trade will be raised at a pinch, and Lancashire will demand that Bombay should work her mills on the same conditions as any English city. This is a preposterous demand, and yet the Lancashire people are not overrating their powers at all. If they did, they would have never made such a shameful attempt to force their own legislation upon this country. An Indian Factories' Act must be greatly different from the English Act. There are local causes of great difference which must be considered. The Lancashire agitators will say that there should be uniformity. The reply is, when there is diversity in everything else between the two peoples, how can there be uniformity in the regulation of labour? The class whose interests are so seriously menaced by Lancashire are wealthy men and can stand up for their cause. Let them foresee the danger and open their purses for counter-agitation. If we take our laws from jealous Manchester and Lancashire, then all hope of progress may be abandoned and we may as well leave the field clear for the philanthropic firms of Manchester and Lancashire.

Comments on the Bombay Village Sanitation Bill.

60. The Shri Shiváji (60), in its issue of the 29th March, commenting on the Bombay Village Sanitation Bill, remarks that the Bill requires to be modified to a large extent and that to avoid misconception of its scope and object and to prevent abuse of authority when its provisions will be put in operation, three things must be done; firstly, it should be distinctly and unequivocally stated that the Act is to apply to places where the people are not able or willing or neglect to take the ordinary sanitary precautions without Government pressure; secondly, the duties and functions of the people in respect of sanitation should be clearly defined; and thirdly, what constitutes insanitation must be clearly set forth.

61. In connection with the Bombay Village Sanitation Bill, the Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 3rd April, says:—No provision is made in the Bill in the case of a "sanitary board" failing to perform its duties properly, but there is little doubt that it will be left to the discretion of the District Collector what to do under the circumstances, who is also clothed with power to nominate a "committee" and a "sanitary board." The Collector, however, holds even now such great powers that the public desires them to be curtailed to a great extent and would view with alarm any proposals tending to give him any more authority over the illiterate rural population. From the Bill it seems that the Honourable Sir Raymond West, the framer of it, does not possess sufficient knowledge of the real condition of the villages and the villagers, and the proposed law is likely to disturb the peaceful condition of the rural population, without its benefiting by the change that the measure will bring about. If it be indispensable to enact a law for the sanitation of villages, the same should be more simple and less harsh than the present Bill. It should be of such a nature as would make the villagers effect sanitation by themselves, while the authorities should confine their interference to advice and assistance whenever they were required. To achieve this object successfully it is desirable that further information and suggestions should be collected, and this may be done by translating the Bill into the different vernaculars of the presidency, distributing the translations throughout the different provinces and calling for suggestions from leaders of the various communities. [The Suryă Prakásh (84), in its issue of the 30th March, says that it should be clearly stated in the Bill that no patel or Government pensioner should be nominated a member of the village sanitary committee, as it thinks it sufficient to have one Government officer only on it, that officer being the chairman of the committee. It adds that the Local Boards should be compelled to give their due share to the village sanitary committee instead of the latter being left to their mercy as in the Bill.]

PART III.—Education.

The educational policy of the Bombay Government approved.

62. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 31st March, writes:—While Ráo Sáhebs and Ráo Bahádurs, the leaders of Native society, are incubating a protest against the Bombay Government policy in regard to secondary education, the Government is taking time by the forelock and ordering the enhancement of fees in some schools and the transfer of others. All feel that the financial pressure on the Government is at the bottom of the measures proposed and that the Government is doing its best so to adjust the expenditure as to give the maximum of result with the minimum of money. The policy now pursued is the only one which will succeed. The educational wants of our people will not be satisfied until private agency comes into play. The way to evoke a spirit of self-help is to curtail the amount of external help. Of course if the help be withheld at too early a period, injury will result. But looking to the tendencies of the times everywhere, we think that the present is not an inappropriate occasion when the Government might make an effort to make the high schools paying concerns, applying the money thus set free to the purpose of fostering education in other directions, such as primary and technical.

The educational policy of the Bombay Government condemned.

63. The Poona Vaibhav (48), in its issue of the 31st March, remarks that the present policy of increasing the fees in high schools and making high education costly is calculated to operate as a heavy tax on the people of this country and is in its operation as injurious as the salt-duty or such other taxes on necessaries, education having come to be looked upon as one of the necessaries of life. It would be more consonant with justice, continues the paper, if Government, instead of taxing the food and the means of subsistence of the people of this country, were to direct their attention to reducing the fat salaries of European officers and thus satisfy the voracious appetite of the Finance Committee.

64. The Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 1st April, strongly disapproves of the conduct of Government in transferring the Nagar High School to the control of the local Education Society, which is, in its opinion, a virtual abolition of the school, and censures the present policy of Government as regards high education, as calculated to create a profound dissatisfaction in the minds of the public of this presidency and suicidal to the best interests of Government. The Government, continues the paper, is ruthlessly breaking the pledges given to the people since 1854, and it is much to be regretted that extravagant expenditure in military enterprises should have forced it to continue in a course which is fraught with so much discredit to its fair name and disadvantage to the public at large.

Opening of season schools for the instruction of the agricultural population recommended.

65. The Subodh Patrika (16), in its issue of the 31st March, says:—Village sanitation, about which a Bill is now before the Bombay Legislative Council, has indeed powerful enemies in ignorance, poverty, prejudice and sectional animosities or jealousies among the rural population, though men residing in towns are not free from most of these feelings. We therefore suggest, as a measure of co-ordinate importance, the opening of season schools for the instruction of the agricultural population. The rayat has never yet received full justice in the matter of the local cess, levied ostensibly for his benefit but much of which is diverted to provincial purposes. Half of this cess is meant for education, and, we submit, ought to be spent exclusively on the education of those who pay it. The villagers are unable to send their children to schools, but if schools are opened at their doors during the slack season and at suitable hours of the day, on the model of winter schools in Europe, something can be done to remove their ignorance and to pave the way for their instruction and enlightenment through verbal addresses and cheap tracts on all topics affecting their interests and on which their ignorance is such a bar to their own welfare and their credulity such a difficulty for the Government. We therefore humbly invite the attention of His Excellency the Governor in Council to this question at the same time that this law for the sanitation of villages is elaborated.

Introduction of the vernaculars in the Bombay University curriculum.

66. The Gujaráti (77), in its issue of the 31st March, says that the introduction of the vernaculars in the Bombay University curriculum up to the Previous Examination only is not calculated to improve their status, and hopes that the Senate will make the vernaculars a subject of study at all the higher examinations and will not stop half-way at the Previous Examination.

Complaint against Mr. Macnaghten, Principal, Rájkumár College, Rájkot, and its management.

67. The Rájyabhakt (126), in its issue of the 2nd April, observes:—The students in the Rájkumár College, Rájkot, for want of proper supervision indulge in vicious practices. Arrangements have been made to withdraw the Kolhápur Prince and three other members of his family from the College and to place them under an able European teacher at Dhárwár. The Bhávnagar Prince, Bhávsing, being tired of Mr. Parmánand Valabhrám, a favourite of Mr. Macnaghten, the Principal, is willing to live at Dhárwár and an arrangement to that effect has already been made, as stated by our correspondent at Rájkot. His Highness the Rája of Dhrángadra also wishes to withdraw his sons from the College, but Mr. Macnaghten does not allow him to do so. Mr. Macnaghten is said to have used pressure to make the Bagasra and Láthi Princes go to Mahábaleshvar instead of to their homes. We consider his conduct towards the Princes under him highly objectionable, and request Government to compel him to retire from the service on pension. The Rájkumár College is a useless department, and ought either to be abolished or reformed and put on a better footing. Its continuance in its present condition makes the Princes vicious. Government ought speedily to attend to the matter.

The compulsory system in the New English School, Poona, condemned.

68. The Shri Shiváji (60), in its issue of the 27th March, publishes from a correspondent a letter, in which the writer refers to the tyranny exercised on the students of the New English School, Poona, by their teachers, states that the students are compelled, on pain of dismissal, to attend drill classes, to pay subscriptions for the school reading-room, to buy no books but those published by the teachers of the school, and complains that real and effective teaching is nil, the teachers being new and inexperienced.

Attitude of the educational officers in Kánara towards private educational enterprise in that district.

69. Ráo Sáheb V. D. Joglekar, Subordinate Judge of Honávar, writes to the Kannadă Suvárte (142) in its issue of the 29th March, to say that the statements made by a correspondent against Ráo Sáheb Rámchandra Hanmant Deshpánde, Deputy Educational Inspector, Kánara, regarding his attitude towards private educational enterprise in that district (vide paragraph 41, page 22 of the Report on Native Papers published in the Bombay Presidency for the week ending 16th February 1889) are absurd and utterly groundless; while Mr. G. S. Nádkarni, manager of the private school at Honávar, writes to the same newspaper of the 5th April to say that Ráo Sáheb Joglekar's letter seems to be evidently an attempt to defend the Deputy Educational Inspector and not a statement "in the cause of truth."

PART IV.—Municipalities.

The lighting arrangements of the Bombay Municipality.

70. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 31st March, writes:—It is something to know that so responsible an authority as the Municipal Commissioner describes the lighting arrangements for Bombay as "disgraceful," adding that for Europeans Bombay consists only of Malabár Hill and the Queen's Road, and leaving it to be inferred that a good deal of the town remains to be accounted for. This is an admirable way of putting it, and the only pity is that it was not so put by a non-official and Native member of the Municipal Corporation.

A suggestion to the Bombay Government to appoint a commission of medical men to find out the causes of the prevalence of cholera in Broach.

71. The Broach Samáchár (93), in its issue of the 4th April, complains of the dilatoriness of the local authorities in taking vigorous and timely measures for the prevention of cholera and of its consequent virulence, says that Government should take notice of it, that the people are terror-stricken, and that some of the inhabitants have given up their daily avocations, requests the Bombay Government to speedily appoint a commission of medical men to find out the causes of the permanence of cholera in Broach, and remarks that until this is done the epidemic will not be rooted out.

A suggestion in connection with the appointment of municipal presidents.

72. The Gujarát Mitrá (78), in its issue of the 31st March, says:—If a break-down of a municipal corporation is announced and a president resigns, the Government may try the following experiment. The Government may ask the members of a municipality to mention, say, three names from among them as being, in their opinion, fit to exercise the functions of a president—the majority to mention such names with unanimity. One of the names should be at least official. The majority to bind themselves to follow the lead of any more capable person whom the Government may be pleased to sort out from the three names tendered. From such a president the Government may call for a half-yearly report as to the manner and efficiency of the working of the corporation and as to the conduct of individual or collective members. Any minority or majority would of course always have the right of expressing their opinion. If such an experiment fails, or cannot even be initiated, Government would be fully justified in nominating a District Collector as full-power president, whose powers may be modified at his own discretion. Spites, jealousies and wranglings cannot of course be allowed to undermine the course of any public proceedings manifestly aiming at what is good and progressive in the interests of the community.

The Karáchi Municipality and the recent visit of His Excellency Lord Reay to that town.

73. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 27th March, says:—We notice that the municipality of Karáchi took no part in the proceedings connected with His Excellency the Governor's visit to this province. On the first occasion that His Excellency Lord Reay visited Karáchi an address of welcome was presented as a matter of course by the municipality, but that seems scarcely any reason why the municipal commissioners should not be permitted to welcome His Excellency once more. It is to be trusted that the omission is not intentional.

The Surat Municipality and the removal of the khál-kuvás.

74. The Gujarát Darpan (75), in its issue of the 31st March, says:—That law-makers should not be law-breakers is a maxim as old as the world. It is equally true that they should not allow others to break the law. The Commissioner, Northern Division, seems to have forgotten this principle, when in reply to a reference made to him by the president of the Surat Municipality in connection with the petition signed by nearly ten thousand people anent the khálkuva (underground privies) khatpat as to whether the municipality was legally authorised to serve notices on the people to fill up their khálkuvas, he wrote that the commissioners should push on their threats until a test case is brought before a civil court. This is a very nice piece of advice, indeed. If the municipality fail to make out its case and be obliged to pay heavy damages, it is certain that it will be sued for a large series of the illegal acts which, following the advice of the Commissioner, it will have done. It is strange that a high responsible Government officer as the Commissioner, in a hurry to carry out a reform on which he has set his heart, should ignore the law and advise a municipality placed under him to do the same until it finds itself acting illegally. If there be a flaw in the law as it exists now, which would hinder the municipality in carrying out the scheme, he should get it amended, if possible.

A complaint against the Surat Municipality.

75. The same newspaper says:—At a time when the Government is all for stringent economy and takes advantage of every opportunity to curtail its expenses, our civic fathers, overflowing with the milk of human kindness, play fast and loose with the people's money, though they have to carry out many costly schemes to improve the sanitary condition of the city. They cannot deny that every rupee saved at the present time would stand them in good stead in the future. When possessing this knowledge they do not use it, their conduct becomes highly reprehensible. It is a pity that quite recently they should have done an act which is absolutely illegal, arbitrary and disgraceful. We refer to the offhand manner in which the last Monday's meeting gave away the contract for supplying carts and bullocks to the old contractor for the next three years at the current high rates. According to the usual practice, a public notice ought to have been issued and tenders asked for, at least two months before the expiration of the present contract which ends on the last day of this month. The managing committee had sent this matter to be disposed of by the general body in January last; but as if there was a predetermination somewhere that the contract should be continued indefinitely, it was not brought up for discussion till the day of the expiration of the contract and of the existence of the present corporation. The corporation has been, we think, guilty of the most shameless and disgraceful jobbery and nepotism. We are quite averse to any Government interference, but the present case is such that if the Collector interfered and set the matter right, we should not be displeased. It would be a kind of warning to the corporation and would in future save a good deal of money to the ratepayers. Better even than any Government interference would be a civil suit by a ratepayer to recover damages from the members who have voted in favour of giving the contract in this most illegal and arbitrary manner.

Scarcity of water in Dhárwár and the inaction of the local municipality.

76. The Dhárwár Vritt (27), in its issue of the 4th April, writes:—Dhárwár is in the very throes of water-famine, and yet the local municipality does not awake to the danger which threatens the inhabitants of the place. The commissioners seem to be totally indifferent about this crying want and undertake works of doubtful utility for which the inhabitants of the place do not care at all. It is the duty of Government to enquire carefully and immediately into this distressful state of things, and to urge upon the municipality the necessity for taking timely measures to lessen the intensity of the impending danger.

PART V.—Native States.

A suggestion to abolish Political Agencies in India.

77. The Bakul (22), in its issue of the 31st March, observes:—The Political Agent has become now-a-days a source of much annoyance and petty tyranny to the court to which he is accredited. This official is entrusted with large powers and immense discretion, the duties appertaining to his office are not defined and it has often been found that he plays into the hands of some wire-puller or low intriguer at the court of a Native Rája. Whether inactive and silent spectator of the events in a Native State or a dashing, diplomatic and busy political officer, he is of no use to the court to which he is sent and his post might safely be abolished, and this abolition would effect a large saving in these hard times and none would be the worse for it.

The Native States of Káthiáwár and the Government of Bombay.

78. Writing on the Native States of Káthiáwár, the Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 31st March, observes :—We may say that these States have either too little or too much of British interference. The Government runs from one extreme to the other in most cases. It is seldom that the right middle course is followed. Misrule, injustice, reckless expenditure, or low intrigue is allowed full play for years. It is now a favourite of the Chief, then a nominee of the Political Agent or a person in favour with a Councillor, who is permitted to do as much harm as he possibly can under the protection of his patron. Complaints are first neglected, then listened to, and at last the Government is roused to action. It is now realised that things cannot be suffered to go on as hitherto any longer. In short, it is considered time for interference. And then the tide runs in the opposite direction. In the place of the former policy of so-called non-intervention there is now interference with a vengeance. If previously the Chief had unlimited power to do harm, now he has no power left to prevent harm being done to himself or his subjects. The Government appoints a person as Diwán or administrator, who may wield all authority and reduce the Chief to a nonentity. One may be excused for supposing, in such a case, that the paramount power permits a gross abuse of authority for a long time in order to deprive the State of all authority afterwards. The paramount power does not mean it, but virtually it often comes to that. The fault, really speaking, is more with the political officer on the spot. He is expected by Government to represent the affairs of the State in their true light from time to time. If the political officer has the confidence of the Government and deserves it, the latter should not shirk its duty of bringing to bear strong moral pressure on the State, through the Political Agent, for the timely removal of the wrong, in whatever form it may exist.

His Excellency Lord Reay and the introduction of reforms in Káthiáwár.

79. The Rájyabhakt (126), in its issue of the 2nd April, writes :—The Bombay Government have resolved to introduce the following reforms in Káthiáwár, viz., (1) to appoint a civilian as Political Agent, Káthiáwár, instead of a military officer ; (2) to abolish the Rájasthánik court in that province ; (3) to abolish the Agency State Vakils ; (4) to entrust the management of the police to a European officer ; (5) to arrange for appeals in civil and criminal cases in the States being heard by the High Court. We are confident that the Government of His Excellency Lord Reay will introduce as many of these reforms as possible. The sufferings of the Káthiáwári public will not end until the Political Department is replaced by a Collectorate. The people of Káthiáwár are perfectly satisfied with the just conduct of the Bombay Government. There is no other province so intriguing and so roguish as Káthiáwár. The conduct of the Government officers there is contemptible. The Rájás in the province are mere puppets and their Kárbháris harass their subjects. If His Excellency Lord Reay puts an end to this state of things, he will greatly oblige the people.

The financial condition of Gwalior.

80. The Nyáyă Sindhu (46), in its issue of the 1st April, referring to the action of Government in taking from the State of Gwalior four krors of rupees as a loan and making it bankrupt, remarks with wonder that Gwalior, which to an impartial observer appears to be nearing the course of ruin, appears to Government as financially sound and that Government seem to take a sort of pleasure in the indebtedness of Native States. A Native State in debt to the Supreme Government is always, continues the paper, at its mercy and affords excellent opportunities for annexation. The Berars furnish an example of a Native State being annexed on the ground mentioned above. Gwalior should take a lesson from the history of that province. It would conduce to the welfare of Gwalior if it walked in the footsteps of the late Jayájiráo Mahárája, reduced its expenditure and maintained a strict equilibrium between its revenue and expenditure.

His Excellency Lord Reay requested to take measures to improve the administration of the Jámnagar State.

81. A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 2nd April, says :—His Highness the Jám of Navánagar is a simple-minded person who takes little interest in the administration of his State, being always engrossed with personal comfort and pleasures. His Highness is surrounded by a number of ill-advisers, to whom he is very pliant and who deserve to be driven away from his company. The several Diwáns who have been supplied to him, one after another, by the Political Agency, have not proved successful administrators, and the State is steeped in heavy debt and outlawry is rampant. It is therefore to be hoped that His Excellency the Governor will duly consider the situation, and will appoint in the interests of His Highness and his subjects an educated, able and energetic person as Diwán and drive away the large number of ill-advisers by whom His Highness is surrounded.

His Highness the Rána of Porbandar and a request to the Bombay Government.

82. The Káthiáwádi (80), in its issue of the 2nd April, disapproves of the rumoured intention of Government to shortly instal the Porbandar Prince on the throne instead of restoring the present Rána with powers, thinks the change to be injurious to His Highness the Rána, pities him, remarks that he has fallen a victim to the displeasure of certain British officers owing to his independent conduct, and strongly recommends Government to make further enquiries before taking the contemplated step in order to know the real truth.

The people and the Native States of Káthiáwár and a petition prepared by the editor and proprietor of the Rájyabhakt newspaper for presentation to His Excellency Lord Reay on their behalf.

83. The Rájyabhakt (126), in its issue of the 2nd April, gives a further instalment of the petition prepared by its editor and proprietor for presentation to His Excellency Lord Reay on behalf of the people and Native Princes of Káthiáwár, exposes the bad and immoral conduct of His Highness the Thákor of Bhávnagar, refers to the alleged trumped up case against a woman named Rádha and Chhagan Sundarji in 1885, to the expenditure of three lákhs of rupees on a prostitute named Kaisar now with the Thákor as a queen, to the present to her of a garden yielding a large income, to the endeavours that are being made to present a first-class village named Jira to her and to the Thákor having forced some persons connected with him to marry the sisters of Kaisar, and remarks that the people and the Ránis of Bhávnagar are displeased with these things, and requests His Excellency Lord Reay to prevent this waste of public money, to prevent dissensions in the State, to remove the persons preying upon it, and in short to take measures for the welfare of the State and its people.

Crime in Kolhápur and complaint against the authorities.

84. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 4th April, publishes a letter from its Kolhápur correspondent, in which he says that that State has been the scene of a series of horrible crimes within the short space of two or three months, and that such a state of things is apt to be interpreted as a sad example of the incompetence of the present administration. He adds that looking to the present situation of Native States it is impossible to say that responsibility for insecurity of life ends with the local administration and does not extend to the paramount power, and hopes that Government will ere long direct its attention to Kolhápur and scrutinize the state of affairs there.

Praise of the Chief of Akalkot.

85. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 1st April, publishes a letter from an Akalkot correspondent in which the Chief of that State is much praised for his attention to State affairs and his readiness to satisfy the wants of his subjects. The Chief, states the paper, has abolished certain obnoxious taxes in his State and thereby gained the approbation of the Supreme Government. He is always to be seen going about his province and visiting and examining schools. In short, he promises to be a model ruler.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

British-Indian subjects in Zanzibar and apathy shown by Government towards them.

1. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 11th April, writes:—In the compact entered into by Great Britain with Germany, the former seems to have been entirely oblivious of the interests of its Indian subjects who reside in Zanzibar for the purposes of trade. The Indian merchants have great interests at stake in that part of the world, and the activity of the Germans on the Zanzibar coast has resulted in great loss to them. The apathy shown by the British Government at these losses has been almost scandalous, and it is only recently that some attention seems to have been drawn to the subject. The Germans, too, perhaps thought that they had gone too far and Captain Wissman has given assurances of safety and protection to the Indian merchants. Surely it seems rather strange that peaceful merchants trading under British protection should require to be assured of safety by a German officer.

Losses suffered by the British-Indian traders on the Zanzibar Coast by the action of the German Government.

2. The Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 13th April, says:—The British-Indian traders on the Zanzibar Coast did not discard or oppose the German authorities, and yet their places of abode were bombarded without giving them previous notice of the bombardment as required by the principle of international law, and much valuable property belonging to them was destroyed either by fire or pillage by Arab badmashes. And still the British Government has not come forward to obtain compensation for them from the German Government. Thus the British-Indian traders have been reduced to a most pitiable condition and are left without redress. Certainly it does not become the British Government to refuse to obtain compensation for its wronged subjects. The Foreign Office ought not to be lax in the due protection of the interests of the Indian subjects of the English Crown. The Bombay Chamber of Commerce and the Native merchants of Bombay should submit to the Supreme Government a proper representation of the injustice done to the Indian traders on the Zanzibar Coast and make due efforts to obtain justice for the ruined traders.

The proposed construction of a dock for Her Majesty's navy at Bombay and remarks on the cost thereof.

3. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 7th April, writes:—The construction of a dock for Her Majesty's navy at Bombay, it seems, has been in contemplation for some time and in reply to a question put in Parliament it was stated that "pending the distribution of expenses between the Imperial and the Indian Governments the matter was still under the consideration of both Governments." If the dock were constructed at Gibraltar, Malta, or even in Ceylon, the whole cost would be borne by the Imperial Government; but because it is to be located at Bombay, a half of it is proposed to be saddled on India. Were a moiety of all the Imperial, i.e., the military, naval and political, charges of the Government of India borne by England, India could not object to the present proposal; but in the absence of that arrangement the newly proposed burden cannot but be considered oppressive. The possessions named above are no doubt small and their resources equally so, but that does not affect the principle of the question; for, even in regard to the larger and more powerful and wealthy colonies like Canada and Australia, the Imperial Government follows the same policy of self-abnegation that it does towards the smaller possessions specified above. It is only in regard to India that it adopts a hard, exacting and one-sided rule. India is certainly a large country, but it is also poor and has already heavy burdens to bear. To be sure the Under-Secretary of State for India, from his place in Parliament the other day, depicted his charge to be overflowing with the milk and honey of prosperity, and rapidly increasing prosperity too. But we fancy it has not been found easy to spare a slice of this glowingly described prosperity for the new project of an imperial dock at Bombay, nor has our Finance Minister found it possible to show a surplus in his budget for the new year without the aid of income derived from injustice—a fine of more than half a kror of rupees on local Governments, which must either starve their works or levy taxation under a new name. These and other not very regular shifts, which the Government of India finds it necessary to adopt in order to make both ends meet, do not mean prosperity among its subjects, and can never mean it so long as abnormal burdens are laid on their shoulders, which in fairness ought to be at least equally shared by England.

Attention of the House of Commons drawn to the alleged Bhyndar jobbery at the close of Sir J. Fergusson's régime as Governor of Bombay.

4. In noticing the circumstances under which a piece of waste land in the village of Bhyndar was presented to Shaikh Abdul Gaffur, head of the household of Sir James Fergusson, for the production of salt, as described in the decision in appeal of the Bombay High Court, in the suit Háji Bakir valad Shaikh Sáheb Fakir and others vs. Shaikh Abdul Gaffur and others, the Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 10th April, says:—What services did Abdul Gaffur render to the public that he was considered entitled by Government officers to receive the present of a valuable plot of ground? If he rendered valuable service to His Excellency the Governor, the latter should have rewarded him from his own pocket and not from the State treasury. Perhaps some special circumstances do exist that might remove the impression made by the case on the public mind, and hence it is desirable that the House of Commons should call upon Sir James Fergusson to explain what they were, if any.

The Indian financial statement and a suggestion that it be made compendious and simple.

5. The Gujaráti (77), in its issue of the 7th April, writes:—There is no earthly reason why the Indian financial statement should always be a voluminous document of inordinate length so as to attract none but experts to undertake the labour of going through it at least once. We certainly think that for the majority of readers the statement can be easily presented in a more simplified form. As things stand at present no practical benefit is derived from its publication in the Government Gazette. If it is really desired by the Financial Member that his labours should result in some instruction to the majority of newspaper readers, it is necessary to do away with the cumbrous system of account-keeping and draw up a simple statement of income and expenditure in a compendious and instructive form as could be profitably read by all. There would be in that case a wider appreciation of the contents of the statement, and the educational influence exercised by reading it in the original will be of immense benefit to the people as well as to the Government, whose aims and objects are many a time misunderstood owing to the scanty information possessed by their critics.

Opinion of Sir D. Barbour on the income-tax assessment in India commented upon.

6. The Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 8th April, says:—The Indian Finance Minister has either through a misunderstanding or purposely formed the opinion that the small number of appeals against the income-tax assessments in Bombay and other places indicates that the people of India have been reconciled to this tax. This view is, however, quite wrong. The small number of the appeals is owing to the people finding themselves quite helpless to escape the burden of this unpopular tax, and they therefore silently submit to the evil. The people are really tired of the tax and anxiously desire its abolition. [The Satyavakta (129), in its issue of the 12th April, expresses similar sentiments.]

The salt-duty in India and remarks of the Honourable Durga Charandás in connection with it commented upon.

7. The Suryodayă (63), in its issue of the 8th April, strongly disapproves of the speech of Rája Durga Charan in connection with the budget statement, and says that his remarks as to the salt-duty not being a heavy tax and its incidence not being oppressive are founded on gross ignorance and selfishness. The paper adds that so long as men like the Honourable Durga Charan are in the Viceregal Legislative Council, all hope of improvement in the condition of the poor rayat may be abandoned, that his remarks in connection with the income-tax and its operation have a ring of selfishness about them which is peculiarly his own, and that men who have nothing in common with the people of India, such as Sir William Wedderburn, take up the cause of the Indian rayat and fight strenuously for him, while the children of the soil make such shameless remarks as above.

His Excellency the Viceroy and the A'bkári Department.

8. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 7th April, writes:—We are extremely sorry to find that His Excellency the Viceroy is playing rather too much into the hands of the Secretariat bureaucrats. It is rather too soon in the day to be able to pronounce opinions on some of the admittedly knotty questions of the Indian administration. The declaration he made about his financial policy is sure to draw upon him the unfavourable opinion not only of his Indian subjects but his colleagues in Government in the different provinces. His views about the administration of the ábkári laws are not the less open to severe criticism. In his speech from the presidential chair the other day he declared hasty opinions on three most controversial points connected with the administration of the Excise Department. Those who have found fault with the ábkári laws and the methods of administering them have never argued that increasing revenue necessarily means increasing consumption. What they have urged is that the policy of maximum revenue with the minimum of consumption has failed. They have been showing that the system is so faulty that not only that it does not meet the objects in view but that it exposes Government to unavoidable attacks and gives the people just reasons to question their motives. The critics of the ábkári laws represent that the ábkári administration should, as early as may be practicable, cease to be an Imperial department and that it must be provincialised, if not localised, the Government of India requiring that consumption of the deleterious drug be reduced to the minimum.

The Indian military authorities and the alleged supply of prostitutes to European soldiers in India.

9. The Suryodaya (63), in its issue of the 8th April, referring to the account given in the Christian paper Sentinel of the manner in which the military authorities arrange to supply women to soldiers, observes that it is a shame that the British Government, which makes the loudest profession of its rigid morality, should thus degrade itself in the eyes of the Indian public by giving countenance to such immoral circulars issued by military officers as have lately seen the light. Although the Government has publicly announced that the Contagious Diseases Act is no longer in operation and that the practice hitherto prevalent in the Military Department of supplying women to soldiers shall cease, the evil has not disappeared, the orders of Government are not properly executed and the former immoral system is in full swing. The paper hopes that Government will immediately pay attention to this abominable and disgusting conduct on the part of the military authorities and prevent its fair name being ineffaceably tarnished. [The Yajdán Parast (141), in its issue of the 7th April, says that this public scandal should be stopped and that Parliament should take strict notice of it. The Rájyabhakt (126), in its issue of the 9th April, writes:—What has become of the promise given by the Secretary of State for India in the matter? Is the money raised by oppressive taxes imposed upon the people, who are allowed to starve, thus utilized? The Indian National Congress ought certainly to take up the matter. For this very reason we do not wish that military men should be employed in Political Agencies. When do Government mean to stop such a disgrace? A few other papers also condemn the alleged disgraceful practice of supplying prostitutes to European soldiers and wish it to be immediately stopped by Government.]

The address of His Excellency the Governor to the Bombay Chamber of Commerce.

10. After expressing great gratitude to His Excellency Lord Reay for striking a new path by giving an account to the Bombay Chamber of Commerce of what had been done by the Bombay Government to meet the views of the mercantile community in effecting desirable economies in the administration and in facilitating trade by removing impediments, the Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 13th April, says:—If the succeeding Governors explain their administrative measures, as Lord Reay has done, much of the misunderstanding that exists in not taking the public into confidence would disappear and very healthy relations would arise between the governors and the governed, greatly facilitating the work of administration. The Chamber urged Government to effect economy in the administrative expenditure, and His Excellency has shown in his address that the recommendation has been seriously adopted. The Educational Department has been subjected to such heavy reductions as to leave it on the brink of a precipice, making even the slightest further interference a certainty of its complete destruction. This sad condition of this useful department has greatly dissatisfied the public, and if it had not been touched the public would not have grudged the transfer of eighty-eight lákhs of rupees to the imperial treasury within the last three years without imposing a new tax on the Bombay Presidency. The Chamber has been urging upon the Bombay Government the necessity for opening new railway lines, forgetting that this could not be well done without the imposition of a new tax. The existing policy of effecting railway extension as financial convenience would allow is quite satisfactory and ought not to be deviated from. [The Jáme Jamshed (108) of the same date expresses some of the above sentiments, and remarks that there still remain some highly-paid posts that might be abolished without inconvenience to the public service, transferring the work to those officers whose duties are very light.]

11. The Gujarát Darpan (75), in its issue of the 7th April, writes:—We cannot sufficiently applaud the conscientious aim of the Governor of Bombay to endeavour to reign, as if it were, in the hearts of the people. That such a high dignitary should in the interests of the people confided to his care and protection shake off a great deal of his pompous air and administrative superiority and promise an address on the subject of transit duties to the Bombay Chamber of Commerce is indeed a matter for congratulation. The theme is certainly inviting and with His Excellency Lord Reay it has a special importance and value of its own. His strongest denunciations of the transit duties in many of his speeches made in reply to the addresses of municipalities and Native princes are well-known to us all. [The Kaiser-i-Hind (111), in its issue of the 7th April, says that His Excellency Lord Reay has made a good beginning in the matter, thereby manifesting his anxiety, as an advocate of free trade, for the public interests, that it should not end there, and that the public would like to hear him declare his opinion on many other important questions. The Hitechchhu (79) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 11th April, praises His Excellency Lord Reay for this innovation, says that if the rulers were thus to publicly explain their policy in important matters affection between them and the subject-people would certainly increase, that it would be difficult to get a Governor like him for this presidency, and prays that he may be happy and prosperous and achieve glory wherever he may go.]

12. The Sind Sudhár (164), in its issue of the 6th April, writes:—A remarkable example of meekness, humility and benevolence which His Excellency Lord Reay has shown us during his recent visit to Sind has still more endeared him to the people. On Wednesday last, when His Excellency was at Karáchi, he left Government House at 8 A.M. and proceeded alone on foot to see the town. Near the Dinso Hall, Mr. Daulatrám Jetmal met him, and in his company he saw all the narrow streets of the town besides the Napier Quarters, the Bagdadi Lane, the Khori Garden and the quarters which poor people inhabit. From the way in which he went on speaking with Mr. Daulatrám nobody even suspected that he was the Governor or that the Governor had entered the town. If the Governor-General and Governors of the other presidencies were to imitate Lord Reay, they would not only be enabled to make themselves better acquainted with the condition of the country and of the people, but would also awaken the subordinate officials to their sense of duty.

His Excellency Lord Reay's disapproval of the proposed separation of Sind from the Bombay Presidency.

13. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 8th April, writes:—His Excellency the Governor's reply to the Sind Sabha ought to set at rest for some time at least the vexed question of the separation of Sind from the Bombay Presidency. Lord Reay deprecates "the break of gauge" which the separation would involve, and it is very satisfactory to see that His Lordship remonstrated against the proposal when it was last mooted. Our countrymen of Sind are fully conscious of the benefits they have derived by their connection with Bombay, and they look upon the separation with no favouring eyes. "The present Viceroy," Lord Reay says, "is too cautious and sagacious a statesman to approach a big question of the kind without mature consideration." Bombay and Sind have long been in companionship and they have benefited by each other's company. It is undesirable that this companionship should be broken up, and it is to be hoped that Lord Reay's representations will carry all the weight they deserve with His Excellency the Viceroy.

The rumoured resignation of His Excellency Lord Reay considered a malicious invention of the Pioneer.

14. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 7th April, writes:—The Allahabad paper which publishes the following rumour as "trustworthy information" must have a very curious sense of "trustworthiness." It is said that Lord Reay's position "has become untenable" and that his resignation may be expected any moment. The gentleman who conveyed this intelligence to the said Allahabad paper probably followed the wish of his heart rather than the dictates of his judgment in the matter. No doubt to the friends of Mr. Crawford nothing could afford greater satisfaction than the disgrace of a nobleman who unlike his predecessors in office did not find it compatible with his notions of justice and honour and integrity of the administration to shut his eyes and ears to what was being done and talked of about him. He has sinned indeed against Mr. Crawford and it is but natural that the latter's friends should try to annihilate him. It is only surprising to us how the shrewd journalists in other parts of India allow themselves to be gulled by the tactics of this small ring of news-manufacturers. This "conspiracy" has been thoroughly exposed and yet people walk into the pits prepared for them by these designing folks. The "corrupt" Mámlatdárs are always brought on the stage to draw off the attention of the people from the real issue involved in the recent inquiry. The opinion of the Crawford Commission is to be taken as finally deciding that issue, as if there were no other evidence in the background, which unfortunately the Commission declined to allow to be brought forward before it. These people are not even ready to wait until the Secretary of State for India gives his decision in the matter. That decision, it is gratuitously supposed, must be unfavourable to Lord Reay, and the only thing left is to get rid of him as early as may be practicable.

The conduct of the London Times and other newspapers in connection with the Crawford case commented upon.

15. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 7th April, writes:—It is something to know that, notwithstanding the London Times' special pleading, or rather special condemnation, His Excellency Lord Reay is not without friends in England in connection with the Crawford Commission, and that "there are many who cherish admiration of the courageous course he has taken throughout this affair," and that "they are to be found in the India Office as well as out of it," though "hitherto much has not been heard of them in the press." We are neither surprised nor impatient here in India. We can well await a final and deliberate judgment of unbiassed and well-informed English opinion in this as in most other Indian matters. What has amazed, even scandalized, us is the conduct of those English publicists who, on the one hand, complain of the shortcomings of the Native Indian press and, on the other, set it the worst possible example in discussing public questions under the influence of prejudice and passion supported by class-interests and misrepresentation.

The Anglo-Indian press and its attack on the Bombay Government in connection with the Crawford case.

16. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 3rd April, writes:—The latest vicious attack against the Bombay Government appears in the Pioneer and several other papers in the shape of a telegram to the effect that the Government are going to prosecute and otherwise punish certain Mámlatdárs who had either declined to give evidence in the Crawford case or had given evidence favourable to Mr. Crawford. These malicious and often deliberately false reports are transmitted to England as regularly as they are trumped up here. Ever since the suspension of Mr. Crawford and the withdrawal of criminal proceedings against him there has been a ferocious and resolute set against the Bombay Government, and especially against the statesman who stands at the helm of that Government. Ever since the Pioneer called Lord Reay "a well-meaning muddler" and the Sind Gazette, as befitted its position at the tail-end of the crowd, flavoured the remark by substituting a stronger word for "well-meaning" the game has been steadily going on, and every argument and every resource has been exhausted in the attempt to make the Crawford case a personal matter between the Governor in Council and his advisers on one side and Mr. Crawford on the other. This has been the example that the Anglo-Indian press, or the majority of its organs, has been holding up to the Native press and to the whole country for the last six months and more. It has refused to give credit, in the face of overwhelming evidence to the Government of Bombay for rectitude of purpose and perfect honesty; it has refused to recognise the difficulties that the Government had to deal with and the serious responsibility that they had to discharge. In the heat of partisanship everything else has been forgotten, and the Government have been always treated as a personal enemy of Mr. Crawford. All this time these honest critics of the Bombay Government are bewailing the license and the disloyalty of the Native press.

Discredit of the Bombay Government in connection with the Crawford case attributed to their having disregarded the voice of the Native press.

17. The Gujaráti (77), in its issue of the 7th April, writes :—The Crawford case has one interesting aspect which has escaped the attention of our contemporaries. For a number of years the air had been thick with rumours of corruption in the subordinate service. Every Native, high or low, knew much about it and the Native press wrote about it in sufficiently mysterious language. When mámlats were said to have been advertised for sale by a Native paper, there was, we believe, much excitement throughout the Native community; but it was of course difficult for any sane person to undertake the ruinous responsibility of coming forward and calling a spade a spade. Even the prosecution in the Crawford case, with all their resources, have found their work a very arduous one, and it would have been an act of insanity for any private person to bring charges of corruption and bribery against a high official. The fact remains, however, that the administration of India is so conducted that those at its head either remain ignorant of what is common property or wilfully shut their eyes to scandals however grave. The voice of the Native press, though vague and mysterious—and it could not be otherwise in spite of the full knowledge it possessed—was not listened to by those responsible for the sound administration of the presidency. The result was that the matter came to such a crisis that it could not be averted. The recent exposure, though not yet full and comprehensive, has shown how Lord Reay's predecessors in office connived at official irregularities and left an unpleasant legacy to the present administration. Although this time it was not the Native press that brought the matter to a crisis, the fact remains that it had written about it long ago. This circumstance teaches a lesson which our rulers would do well to learn. The Native press is never wilfully malicious or violent, and if it is guilty of some unconscious misrepresentations in certain cases it is because of the want of adequate official information placed at its disposal. It may well congratulate itself on the exposure, because it has served to prove to the world that while it did its duty long ago under the peculiar circumstances in which it was placed, Government treated it with indifference and thus helped to bring themselves into discredit.

The Crawford case and comments on His Excellency Lord Reay's conduct in connection with it.

18. The Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 11th April, writes :—That His Excellency Lord Reay has throughout this unfortunate case acted with the most upright and laudable motives, and that he has done his duty, in one sense cannot be denied. We have never questioned His Lordship's motives, and we are not aware of any one within our knowledge having done so. What is, we believe, found fault with is that His Lordship did not take all the necessary precautions before committing himself to so momentous a step as the suspension of an officer of Mr. Arthur Crawford's position in the service—in short, that His Lordship allowed himself to be misled by his advisers, whosoever they may have been. In such matters good motives and good intentions do not constitute a sufficient defence, if the actions instituted with unquestionably laudable motives turn out to be very false steps. We are really sorry for Lord Reay, and we should not be quite surprised if even Mr. Crawford himself admitted His Lordship's bonâ fides in the limited sense of that expression.

The Crawford case and the telegram sent by the Honourable K. T. Telang to the London Times.

19. The Bakul (22), in its issue of the 7th April, writes:—The Honourable K. T. Telang owes an explanation to the public for his recent action in sending a telegram to Mr. Digby in approbation of the conduct of His Excellency Lord Reay and his Government in the Crawford case. The public is anxious to know in what capacity and on whose behalf this telegram was sent. If the telegram has been sent as expressing the unanimous public opinion in the Bombay Presidency in respect of the Crawford case, then it is unnecessary to point out to a man of Mr. Telang's critical acumen that the public in this presidency is divided in opinion on the point of Mr. Crawford's guilt and does not appear to view the proceedings of Government with entire approbation. Mr. Telang's telegram consequently gives only a partial and coloured version of popular opinion about the matter. When it purports to inform the English public that the conduct of His Excellency Lord Reay and his Government throughout this painful inquiry has been just and impartial it makes a statement which is much wide of the truth. For instance, why should Hanmantráo be tried before a Magistrate and Mr. Crawford before a special Commission consisting of Europeans when both are guilty of the same offence? Under an impartial Government why should such a difference of tribunal exist? Again, Hanmantráo pines in the jail, convicted on evidence which from a legal point of view was far from satisfactory. Is this justice? Again, those Mámlatdárs who confessed to have bought their appointments are left secure in their berths, while those who have been reticent about their doings are dismissed. Does this also accord with the notions of justice and impartiality entertained by Lord Reay's Government? We are at a loss to understand how Government could have the hardihood to pose before the public in this inquiry as actuated by the strictest impartiality and sense of justice when its conduct throughout gives the most emphatic lie to its profession. We make bold to say that the whole blame lies at the door of Government in this Crawford case. It is they and their hesitating conduct that have stigmatised the whole public service of the Bombay Presidency. Apart however from the stigma, the poor tax-payer in the presidency has suffered seriously in his pocket and we are very sorry for him. Mr. Crawford, it is ten to one, may get off scot-free. He has already been acquitted by the Commissioners, and the evidence on which he is to be convicted is so flimsy that not even a pattewálla of Mr. Crawford can be harmed. The poor presidency has had to spend four lákhs of rupees for ruining Mr. Crawford. That is the only gain to us, and all this gain is due to the impartiality of Lord Reay's Government and the questionable wisdom of Lord Reay's admirers and flatterers.

20. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 8th April, writes:—"The friend of equity and even-handed justice" has at last withdrawn the complaint against the offending Mámlatdárs. But even the withdrawal has not been without its dramatic incidents. Pressed to say who supported him in his noble efforts to vindicate justice, Mr. Sáthe would not give out the names. The Magistrate put Sáthe's courage and uprightness to severe proof by shutting him up in a prisoner's cell, and the experience has enough mollifying effect upon him to induce him to relent. The disclosures show how disinterested were the efforts of this champion of justice. Mr. Vidal's action in throwing out the complaint, if technically wrong, was thus thoroughly right on the merits, and we only wish Mr. Sáthe were taught a good lesson for his mischievous and vexatious interference.

The illness of certain Judges of the Calcutta High Court and the prospective temporary vacancies.

21. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 6th April, writes:—The Calcutta High Court is in a bad way just now. Sir Comer Patheram, the Chief Justice, is lying seriously ill. The latest reports are somewhat encouraging, but his recovery is still doubtful. The Honourable Mr. Justice Mitter, the senior Judge, has had a slight stroke of paralysis, and although able to attend Court cannot do much work. In case the Chief Justice gets over his illness he must take leave, and Mr. Mitter being in ill-health also, the officiating appointment will go to the next Judge. So thinks that fairminded paper, the Pioneer. We do not quite see the force of such an argument. If Mr. Mitter takes leave, then the Chief Justiceship will of course go to another Judge. If he does not, then he will be just as fit for the Chief's office as for an ordinary Judge's. It is not stated that his illness was serious or will interfere with his work for a long time. Another Judge on the sick list is the Honourable Mr. Justice Ghose, who will take leave shortly. Some other Judges are on leave. It is therefore not surprising to hear that business in the High Court is almost at a standstill, and prospective temporary vacancies are numerous. By the way, one of the recent appointments to the Calcutta High Court requires some explanation. Mr. Hill, a barrister practising at Allahabad, has been appointed a Judge of the Calcutta High Court in preference to numerous local barristers and pleaders, several of them thoroughly well qualified for a seat on the bench. This is not usual and must cause considerable disappointment to the Calcutta bar.

Approval of the Panjáb Chief Court's ruling as to the right of a husband to maintain a suit for slander against his wife.

22. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 3rd April, writes:—The precedent established by the Panjáb Chief Court in the matter of a husband's right to maintain a suit for slander against his wife must be pronounced a sound one, even if contrary to English law on the subject. According to English law a wife must maintain the suit herself if she is slandered. The husband has no right to do so either in his or her own behalf. But the position of an English wife is very different from that of an Indian wife. In England a wife has more freedom, and is at perfect liberty to appear in a court of law to defend herself or to bring her slanderer to justice. In India it is impossible. No wife, however grossly slandered, can seek the relief that the law gives. She can neither appear in a court nor take any steps to clear her character. If, then, the husband is not allowed to vindicate his wife's character as a personal grievance, there can be no hope of a wife's slandered reputation ever being restored.

A suggestion to the Bombay Legislature to declare rain-betting to be illegal.

23. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 8th April, writes:—The judgment of the Honourable Mr. Justice Scott and the Honourable Mr. Justice Jardine brings to light a case of lapsus legis, which must be speedily made good by the Legislature in the interest of public morals. In all the arguments on the case, whether in the Magistrate's Court or in the High Court, it was agreed on all sides that the practice of rain-betting was as injurious to public morals as any gambling could be. The practice is not criminal within the strict letter of the law, but the law must be amended so as to make it criminal. To ordinary common sense it seems strange that the instrument used for rain-betting should not be as illegal as dice or cards, but now since the Bombay High Court has laid down the law it is no use disputing it. Let us hope the Public Prosecutor will not stop with the decision of the High Court.

24. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 11th April, writes:—The judgment of Mr. Crawley-Boevey in the celebrated rain-betting case was confirmed by the High Court. So, as far as the wording of the Act is concerned, speculation does not fall within its penal provisions and betting will now go on with greater zeal than ever. We think after all the procedure by which people win or lose money on the chance of rain falling at a particular time in a particular quantity is very much akin to gambling, and if the present law does not cover it there ought to be devised a law which will do so. The moral effects of this betting are none the less injurious than those of other betting recognised by law as falling within the purview of the gambling provisions. But this betting alone ought not to be distinguished by being subjected to penalties from other games which are equally games of chance and which are as yet not subjected to any penalty. Horse-betting is, we think, as bad as rain-betting and both ought to cease to be lawful pastimes. We are glad the Government of Bombay took steps for getting this important question finally settled by the highest Court in the presidency, and we are sure, now that the final decision is given, some steps will be taken in the matter which will put a stop to the nuisance.

25. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 7th April, writes:—It would be vain to find fault with the decision of so sound a Judge as the Honourable Mr. Justice Scott with regard to the rain-speculation appeal. The law as it stands makes a distinction between gambling and betting, and Mr. Crawley-Boevey doubtless knew of this when deciding the case in the first instance. But that does not make this form of betting the less noxious. Government must take up the question now; indeed, we thought Mr. Naylor had it before him for official consideration. If there are difficulties in the way, they ought to vanish at the touch of a Judicial Member like the Honourable Sir R. West. [Several other papers also wish that Government should pass a law for the prevention of rain-betting in Bombay.]

The decision of the Bombay High Court in the Vengurla temple case disapproved.

26. The Pratod (51), in its issue of the 8th April, criticises the Bombay High Court decision in the Vengurla temple case of Imperatrix vs. Ráoji Káshiba Gavde and four others at great length, and concludes that although the ruling of the High Court may be in strict accordance with the principles of law the practical consequences of it will be that dissensions between the contending parties will not stop but grow and may assume very undesirable proportions. It remarks that the decision takes no notice of the rights which the lower courts have upheld, and that if the recognised rights of parties were thus to be taken away, serious consequences might follow. The rights, adds the paper, may be trifling in the eyes of the High Court, but they are very valuable in the eyes of those who are fighting for them.

Suggestions in connection with the conviction of Sadánand Yesoba, late cashier and accountant in the Bombay Court of Small Causes.

27. The Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 13th April, says:—Considering the long service of the accused and other circumstances in his favour, the sentence of six years' rigorous imprisonment passed on Sadánand Yesoba, lately employed as a cashier and accountant in the Bombay Court of Small Causes, who was convicted of criminal breach of trust at the last criminal sessions, is severe, and a sentence of two years' imprisonment would have sufficed. Mr. Hart deserves great praise for exposing the criminal conduct of his subordinate, and ought to institute searching enquiries into the different branches of the court. More scandalous rumours have been afloat about the Small Causes Court than about any other judicial court of this city, and it is desirable that searching enquiries should be made into the conduct of clerks, bailiffs and other high as well as low officers of the court. Before enquiry is commenced, information on the subject should be collected from respectable persons and the old and experienced Vakils of the court, as the same would throw much light on it. [The Jáme Jamshed (108) of the same date considers the sentence passed upon the accused as quite appropriate, and requests Mr. Hart to enquire into the conduct of all his subordinates.]

Arrears of work in the Small Cause Court at Karáchi and a suggestion in connection with it.

28. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 3rd April, writes:—One of the present standing grievances against the Karáchi Small Cause Court is the dilatoriness with which the work is done and the consequent annoyance to suitors. This was in some measure minimised by a large number of petty cases being disposed of by the Registrar, who was invested with powers to try suits up to Rs. 20. There will now be a new Judge and a new Registrar of the Court, the latter without any powers. In bringing the case of Mr. Khushirám Khatanmal to the notice of His Excellency the Governor we invite his attention to this fact. Mr. Khushirám was invested with powers of a Judge and exercises them to this day, nearly two years after the complaints against him into which no judicial or even proper departmental enquiry was ever made. His successor has not been invested with any powers, and we feel that it would be unjust to Mr. Hakim to deny him the relief given to his predecessor in office of letting the Registrar try petty cases. For this reason alone, if for none other, Mr. Khushirám should be allowed to assist the new Judge for some time. But beyond everything else an inquiry appears to be called for, and an opportunity should be given to the present Registrar to explain if there are any charges against him.

Offences against public cleanliness and a suggestion to invest the Honorary Magistrates with summary powers.

29. The Shri Shivâji (60), in its issue of the 5th April, says that offences against public cleanliness are very common in Indian towns notwithstanding the precautions taken by the local municipalities, and suggests that the Honorary Magistrates may be invested with powers to try summarily on the spot all cases of nuisance. Such an arrangement, says the paper, will put a stop to this source of insanitation in India.

The Bombay Government resolution on the judi settlement in Ratnágiri strongly disapproved.

30. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 7th April, writes :—More than once we have noticed in these columns the unprecedented injustice that is being done to the Ratnágiri watandárs. The watandárs have been mercilessly deprived of their hereditary services, and that too without the slightest excuse of justice on the part of the Bombay Government. Their services have been abolished and a certain portion of their watan emoluments, technically called judi, has been levied from them. Out of the proceeds of this judi Government is to provide for the performance of the duties hitherto discharged by the watandárs. This judi settlement, or service-commutation settlement as it is otherwise called, is a privilege granted by law to the watandárs, who may or may not exercise it. It is a pure matter of contract. It entirely depends upon the pleasure of the watandárs whether to accept the judi settlement or not. Some of the watans are very petty and such watandárs find it inconvenient to nail themselves to their services the whole year round for a trifling remuneration. It is for the convenience of these watandárs that provision is made by Section 15 of Bombay III of 1874 for the commutation of their services. This section is the only law on the subject, and in clear terms it says that Government is to accept the proposal of the watandárs for the commutation of their services, only if all the sharers in the watan give their consent in writing to such an arrangement being made. Thus our readers will see that this judi settlement is a pure matter of contract between Government and the watandárs. And if so, can a contract be forced upon any one ? If a contract is already entered into, of course the parties to it can be compelled to perform it. But can any one be compelled to make a contract? But unfortunately such is the notion of the Bombay Government. The Government is pleased to think that the judi settlement can be compulsorily enforced on the watandárs, and that it has a full legal right to enforce it. The law on the subject has stood unchanged since 1874 ; and the Act of 1874 too only embodied what till then was the unwritten law on the subject. The question has been once before the High Court, which has ruled that Government is not competent to compulsorily effect the judi settlement. But one change has come to pass, and that is as regards the amenability of the executive to the judicial courts. The Pensions Act of 1871 took away the jurisdiction of civil courts in these matters and at once had the effect of virtually clothing every whim of the executive with legality. In this matter of the judi settlement the executive has been doing things with conscious high-handedness. Moreover the executive has not the courage to submit its workings to the public and the judicial tribunals. The resolution itself is the outcome of mystic confidential and demi-official correspondence. The wording of the resolution is highly discreditable to the British Government. The paper then quotes the Bombay Government Resolution in the Revenue Department, No. 6260, dated the 16th September 1887, and observes :—This is the resolution which thrusts the judi settlement on the Ratnágiri watandárs. It is opposed not only to justice but also to common sense. We daresay, though the resolution technically originates with Lord Reay, His Excellency must be entirely innocent of it. Perhaps we may go further and safely say that the judi matter itself has not yet been considered by His Excellency. We cannot indeed bring ourselves to believe that His Excellency, with his well-known large-mindedness, is capable of the harsh tone of the resolution which professes to punish the watandárs for their being disposed to exact their legal rights to the uttermost ! The resolution is a fact ; but it is not the child of Lord Reay. It is in reality the offspring of the Secretariat despotism. The watandárs have been requesting Government for the last one year to grant them permission to submit the matter to judicial tribunals. But the slippery conscience of the Secretariat dare not do it. Nay, the imperious ways of the Secretariat would not even show the common courtesy of a reply. Before the resolution left the Bombay Castle in a finished form, the matter had been referred to the then Legal Remembrancer; and we have reason to believe that the resolution was passed, not in consequence, but in spite of his suggestions. The watandárs have appealed to the Government of India. The India Government have assured the watandárs that the matter will receive their most careful consideration. This was about 8 or 9 months ago. The decision of the India Government has not yet reached the watandárs. From this it appears that the matter must have been possibly referred back to the Bombay Government for report or explanation. If it is so, then it will again go to the Legal Remembrancer, and possibly to the Advocate-General too. We cannot say how these legal authorities will support the action of the Bombay Executive Government, especially when their opinion has yet to undergo an examination at the hands of the Advocate-General of the Government of India. We have no doubt that matters will be set right by the Supreme Government. We recommend the watandárs to carry the matter even to the highest tribunal, if necessary, and to endeavour to protect their legal rights to the uttermost in spite of this un-British resolution of the Bombay bureaucracy.

Destruction of date-trees in the Thána District and a request to His Excellency Lord Reay.

31. Mr. F. R. Nárgolvála contributes an article to the Rást Goftár (82) of the 7th April, in which he complains of the great destruction of date-trees in the Thána District in the same way as has been the case in the Surat District after the introduction of the A'bkári Act of 1878 and of the consequent loss suffered by the people, quotes the instance of the Umbargaon petty division in which more than one lákh and a half of date-trees have been destroyed, says that the owners of the trees have thereby suffered a heavy loss and that thousands of families have been reduced to starvation, and requests His Excellency Lord Reay to reduce the present heavy duty on the trees and to abolish the auction system and to thereby earn the blessings of the people.

Severity of tax on toddy-trees in the Surat District.

32. Mr. P. B. Dántra writes to the same paper requesting those owners of toddy-trees in the Surat District who, he hears, are about to have them cut down as they make no profit out of them owing to the heavy tree-tax and other restrictions, to wait till the 31st July next, as he hopes that Government will by that time relax the severity of its rules as regards toddy. He adds that if by that time the owners of toddy-trees find that no benefit has accrued to them, they might do whatever they like with their trees.

The Zamindárs and Háris in the Shikárpur District and a request to His Excellency Lord Reay.

33. The Sind Sudhár (164), in its issue of the 6th April, writes:—Respecting the rights of Zamindárs and Háris in the Shikárpur District, His Excellency Lord Reay said in reply to the address of the Sind Sabha that he had received Dr. Pollen's report on the subject, but that owing to pressure of work he had not been able to give the subject his attention. He added that as he was now going to Mahábaleshvar he would be able to take the matter in hand and pass a resolution on the subject by the month of August. We hope that His Excellency will dispose of the matter even earlier than in August, seeing that the Zamindárs are very anxious to know the result, because in the meantime their claims are ignored.

Praise of Mr. Propert, Commissioner, S. D.

34. The Satyă Shodhak (57), in its issue of the 7th April, writes:—Mr. Propert, Commissioner for the Southern Division, is entitled to the thanks of all people for his straightforward conduct in bringing to the notice of Government and preventing the injustice that was being done to senior officers in giving the vacant Deputy Chitnisship at Dhárwár to a comparatively junior officer. Mr. Propert is a very just officer and his example may worthily be followed by other officers who have in their hands a large patronage to dispose of. There should be strict rules in filling up vacant places and an officer who sticks to such rules is sure to win popularity.

Appointment of a civilian as Political Agent, Káthiáwár, instead of a military officer, recommended.

35. The Nyáyadarshak (121), in its issue of the 8th April, points out the necessity for appointing an able, clever and active civilian as Political Agent, Káthiáwár, in place of the late Colonel Watson, approves of the rumoured intention of Government to nominate Mr. Crawley-Boevey, Collector of Surat, to that post, and says that the Káthiáwári public will be satisfied with the appointment of this clever, impartial and experienced officer, who is also well acquainted with the manners and customs of the Native States. It adds that the appointment of Mr. Crawley-Boevey or of Mr. James, Collector of Ahmedabad, to the post in question will give satisfaction to the public at large. [The Rájyabhakt (126) of the 9th April does not wish that Colonel Wodehouse should be nominated Political Agent, Káthiáwár, and says that it has received many complaints against him, that it kept quiet because of his transfer and that Government should appoint a military officer to the post if they desire to deal with another Crawford case, and that it is necessary that a civilian should be given the office, and that too of the stamp of Mr. Crawley-Boevey.]

Appointment of Khán Bahádur Kávasji Jamsetji Lálkáka as Acting Deputy Post Master General, Central Provinces and Berár, approved.

36. The Rást Goftár (82) of the 7th April approves of the appointment of Khán Bahádur Kávasji Jamsetji Lálkáka as Acting Deputy Post Master General, Central Provinces and Berár, praises and congratulates the Khán Bahádur on his appointment to this high post, and remarks that the Pársis have proved very successful in the postal department and are paving the way for other worthy Native gentlemen. It adds that the publication of the Postal Record by Mr. Kávasji Bádsháh, C.S., Post Master General, North-West Provinces, shows how useful a worthy officer can prove himself in the postal department.

Mr. Hakim's appointment as Judge of the Small Cause Court, Karáchi, approved.

37. The Sind Sudhár (164), in its issue of the 6th April, writes:—In consequence of the transfer of Mr. Pinhey to Bombay, Mr. Muhamad Husein Hakim, barrister-at-law, has been appointed Judge of the Small Cause Court at Karáchi. We are very glad to find that Government have after all paid attention to our recommendation to appoint a Native to the local Small Cause Court Judgeship.

Mr. Hormasji Dádábhái, Pleader, recommended for the acting appointment of a Judge of the Small Cause Court, Bombay, that is likely to occur by Mr. Pinhey's going on sick leave.

38. The Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 12th April, says:—Mr. Pinhey, the Fourth Judge of the Bombay Small Cause Court, is said to be going home on a long sick leave, and if he does so, it is to be hoped that the acting appointment will be conferred on Mr. Hormasji Dádábhái. Mr. Hormasji has been a successful pleader and has acted about half a dozen times as a Judge of this Court, giving satisfaction to the public as well as to Government. There were several opportunities to confer a permanent appointment on him, but it is to be regretted that this was not done. However, the acting appointment in question will, it is hoped, be bestowed on him, taking the first opportunity to confer on him a permanent appointment.

Disapproval of the proposed memorial in honour of Colonel Watson and a request to the Bombay Government.

39. The Rájyabhakt (126), in its issue of the 9th April, refers to the memorial fund recently started with a view to perpetuate the memory of Colonel Watson, late Political Agent, Káthiáwár, says that it is necessary that Government should stop the raising of memorial funds in honour of Political Agents, as petty Native States are subjected to oppression on this pretext, and remarks that Colonel Watson has done nothing for the good of the Káthiáwári public, that he has been a father to the Nágars, that he has freely given employment to them and that hence his praise by them. [The Nyáyadarshak (121), in its issue of the 8th April, observes that the fund raised in memory of the late Colonel Watson is a sort of a tax on the Native Princes and persons employed in the province of Káthiáwár at a time when something like a famine prevails there, and requests the Bombay Government to interfere as it thinks that the contributions made to the fund by Native Princes and others are not all voluntary.]

Alleged distressed condition of the rayats in the Chikhli Táluka of the Surat District.

40. A correspondent of the Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 10th April, says:—The Chikhli Táluka of the Surat District also is suffering distress from short crops as the Párdi, Bulsár and Mándvi tálukás of the same district, and yet no notice has, it seems, been taken of it by the authorities. The rayats of the Chikhli Táluka are more illiterate than those of the Párdi, Bulsár and Mándvi divisions, who have often brought their distressed condition to the notice of Government while the rayats of Chikhli have done nothing of the kind. For all that, the farmers of Chikhli do not suffer distress the less and it is to be hoped that relief-works will be soon opened for their benefit also, when a similar provision is made for the agriculturists of the other three tálukás.

Distressed condition of the agriculturists in several villages of Gujarát.

41. The Gujarát Mitrá (78), in its issue of the 7th April, says that owing to the scanty rainfall and the failure of crops the condition of the rayats in several villages of Gujarát is pitiful and that those of them who depend solely upon the monsoon crops have suffered more, refers to the distressed state of the agriculturists in the villages of the southern portion of the Daskroi Táluka, district Ahmedabad, and those in the west of Sánand and in the north-east of Viramgám, and remarks that the severity exercised by Government in the collection of the land revenue is a great hardship.

Mr. Lee-Warner's advice to the Natives commented upon.

42. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 8th April, writes:—Mr. Lee-Warner's advice is, "First succeed in self-government boards, then ask for representation on the Legislative Councils." We accept the first part of the advice, but we do not see why it should be made a condition of the second. The local self-government boards must indeed be worked by our people in all earnestness. Mr. Lee-Warner's advice in this respect deserves to be well laid to heart. We fear some of our boards have not yet arrived at a full consciousness of their duty and responsibility in regard to the work entrusted to them. It is highly necessary that there should be no remissness on their part. But we do not see why a moderate reform of the Legislative Councils must needs be deferred in order to find out how far the people work the self-government boards successfully. The work on the boards may be a good preparation for the work on the Councils, but it need not be made a condition of the latter.

Alleged prevalence of small-pox in Karáchi and a request to Government to make vaccination compulsory in Hyderabad.

43. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 6th April, writes:—According to the latest reports there is a great deal of small-pox in Karáchi at present, and the death-rate from this disease is also high, many deaths having occurred among what are called "protected" cases or those who have been vaccinated once or oftener. Scientists are not agreed as to the advantages arising from vaccination, but that is a matter into which we need not go at present. So long as Government and the majority of other people retain their faith in vaccination every effort should be made to extend its operation. In the case of Karáchi, although there is local compulsory vaccination, there is one great danger from outside. The absence of compulsory vaccination at Hyderabad constitutes a source of danger not only to that town but also to Karáchi. The passenger traffic between these two cities is very large, and nothing is more probable than a constant influx of a large number of unprotected persons, perhaps some with the germ of the disease in them, from Hyderabad into Karáchi. Against this danger, which can never be merely fanciful, there is no safeguard, and it can be never averted until vaccination is made compulsory in Hyderabad. We do not know what prevents the Deputy Sanitary Commissioner from moving in the matter. If it is alleged that the people of Hyderabad would object very strongly to the introduction of compulsory vaccination, the reply would be found in the fact that other towns objected quite as strongly but their objections had to be over-ruled. The population of Hyderabad is an intelligent population, and would readily realise the benefits of vaccination as soon as it is introduced. This is evidently a crying evil at Hyderabad and should be remedied with as little delay as possible. By safeguarding Hyderabad against such an epidemic we are certain that Karáchi will be safeguarded more effectually than at present.

The Bombay police force and the necessity for increasing its strength.

44. The Gujaráti (77), in its issue of the 7th April, writes:—We are glad to learn that Colonel Wilson, Police Commissioner, Bombay, has made a strong representation to the Government for an increase in the Bombay police. There are some parts of the city which require greater protection than others which are inhabited by peaceful and educated people, and yet curiously enough the former are less attended to than the latter. Again we think it is not the increase in number alone that will give increased security to life and property; it is the superior quality of the men that will ultimately conduce to the efficiency of the force, and we hope the fifth or lowest grade of sepoys will be abolished at the earliest opportunity. The necessity for strengthening the police force has been clearly set forth in the columns of the Times of India, and although we are opposed to any kind of extravagant expenditure we are quite prepared along with our contemporary for a moderate outlay to meet the pressing exigencies of the natural development of one of the most prosperous cities in the Indian Empire. [The Kaiser-i-Hind (111) of the 7th April supports Colonel Wilson's scheme for strengthening and improving the Bombay police force.]

Want of a full-time Police Superintendent for the Thar and Párkar District.

45. The Sind Sudhár (164), in its issue of the 6th April, writes:—Though the want of a full-time Police Superintendent for the Thar and Párkar District has been brought to the notice of Government on several occasions, no steps have yet been taken to supply that want. It is greatly to be wondered at that in the Thar and Párkar District the functions of the Police Superintendent should be entrusted to the revenue officials of the district, while in the small district of Upper Sind Frontier there should be a separate Superintendent of Police, and in each of the districts of Karáchi, Hyderabad and Shikárpur there should be not only a Superintendent but also an Assistant Superintendent of Police. The want of a full-time Police Superintendent in the Thar and Párkar District has been greatly felt, as that district is much larger in area than any other district in Sind and as the strength of the police therein is also comparatively greater. On the close of his annual tour the Deputy Commissioner comes to Hyderabad with his entire establishment to enjoy the cool breeze, and if, during the hot season, a murder or other heinous crime is committed in his district, he neither goes himself nor deputes his Assistant to the scene of crime, but leaves everything to the subordinate police officers, to whom it is a matter of no great consequence whether the offence is detected or not. We are therefore inclined to think that if there were a separate Police Superintendent, with head-quarters at Umarkot, and he himself visited the scene of every crime, his subordinates would do all in their power to detect the offenders. By the appointment of a full-time Police Superintendent some saving can easily be effected in the present cost of the police force. During the hot season the Deputy Commissioner stays at Hyderabad and he employs a large number of sowárs as his orderlies. Besides several other sowárs come to Hyderabad in charge of prisoners from the various parts of the Thar and Párkar District. Now, if the Deputy Commissioner's head-quarters were at Umarkot, the services of his orderlies at Hyderabad can be dispensed with, and their duties imposed on the mounted police force at present stationed at Umarkot. The posts of a large number of sowárs who now escort prisoners to Hyderabad can either be abolished or, if retained, the sowárs will be enabled to attend to their duties much more satisfactorily than it is possible for them to do at present. The prisoners to be sent up to the Deputy Commissioner can be brought before him by the ordinary police, thána by thána. The grounds stated above for the appointment of a full-time Police Superintendent in the Thar and Párkar District are very strong, and we hope that Government will see the necessity for carrying out our suggestions.

Alleged circulation of counterfeit rupees in Káthiáwár and a suggestion to the police.

46. The Káthiáwár Times (81), in its issue of the 7th April, writes:—A correspondent informs us that counterfeit rupees have been in circulation here for some time past on a pretty large scale. They are made of katheel (tin) and could be easily distinguished from the genuine coins. They weigh from 12 to 13 annas. The police should be on the look-out of the budmashes who manufacture or circulate such spurious coins and should endeavour to bring them to book soon.

Complaint against the police of Pen.

47. The Sudhákar (62), in its issue of the 6th April, publishes a letter from a correspondent complaining of the great dilatoriness of the police in preventing the row that took place in the Rámeshwar temple on Tuesday last and in capturing the mad man who was the cause of it, and blames the Chief Constable for not having taken prompt measures to handcuff the man who was having his own way for a good many hours. The paper hopes that in future the Police Superintendent and the Chief Constable will pay prompt attention to such rows, which are a disgrace to the police administration of the táluka.

PART II.—Legislation.

The Bombay Village Sanitation Bill commented upon.

48. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 7th April, publishes the following contribution:—I have written on the Village Sanitation Bill with the view of making the Act a practical working Act instead of an official sham. I have said that the people should be treated according to the light that is in them and encouraged to go with the law and sustain it, and that their sanitary education should be made a step by step process. The Bill aims at sanitary perfections and might be suitable for the retired tradesmen of London who have formed hamlets for themselves in the vicinity of the great city. In my step by step process I have taken the two chief sanitary factors which provoke disease and endanger life in India and have asked Government to confine the provisions of the Bill to these two—I allude to water and refuse. I say the Bill should provide effectually for preventing the fouling of any water that may, by possibility even, be used as potable water. Every villager can comprehend the virtue of this law. It will cost him nothing to maintain it in its integrity and his health will be benefited by maintaining it. It might also be provided that all vegetable matter be removed from wells and tanks. This will cost very little labour and no money. Of refuse, I say it should be collected daily or every second or third day, and deposited on some leeward spot where it can injure no one. Its disposal may be by fire or by use as manure. The conditions of this use should be placed in the hands of the villagers themselves, provision being only made for its regular and permanent disposal in one of the two ways mentioned. If these two points are attended to the health-benefit of the people will be an improvement of 75 per cent. and a really great sanitary improvement will be effected. Beyond those two points I would not go. If such a Bill of about 6 or 8 clauses could be passed a real and substantial sanitary reform will result. Ten years after this Bill has succeeded in effecting what was intended, the villagers will have been sufficiently educated to take the next two steps, namely, improved dwellings and channels for the removal of liquid sullage. The editor remarks:—It will be seen that the writer shows considerable insight into the conditions of village life. He knows by experience probably that the villager is after all ignorant of all your modern theories of hygiene, as also of your modern system of managing things by means of boards and committees. He therefore very wisely suggests that the provisions of the Bill ought to be simple in the first place, and secondly they ought to deal with those disease-causes which the villager can be made soonest to know and to avoid. These causes lie in the fouling of water and accumulation of rubbish, &c. It will not be difficult, as the writer contends, to induce the villager to keep the village clean and the water stores undefiled. The result of these precautionary measures will not take long to show itself. The writer of the above-quoted note will allow a period of about ten years to elapse before taking the next steps in advance. The villager's mind being then prepared somewhat for the reception of new hygienic truths, improved dwellings and channels for dirty water may be introduced. The scheme, though it might appear to some people a very slow process, is yet a practical one that takes account of the present circumstances and deals with them in a forbearing spirit so as not to raise vain opposition. We hope some of our legislators will press this view upon the attention of Government.

PART III.—Education.

His Excellency Lord Reay's reply to the address of the Sukkur Municipality pronounced inconsistent with his recent educational policy.

49. The Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 8th April, writes :—Lord Reay, during the course of his reply to the address of welcome presented by the Sukkur Municipality, said : "Then with regard to education you have very wisely determined to avail yourselves of the natural laboratory which the railway has been good enough to establish for you in their workshops, and to start in connection therewith a technical school, so that you may no longer be outstripped in the race by smaller localities in Sind which have been most successful in starting lessons in various handicrafts, of which the credit is mainly due to a sagacious Deputy Collector, Khán Bahádur Kadirdád Khán. I notice with pleasure that you give your support to the Arts College at Karáchi. That College deserves not only to receive aid from the inhabitants of the place where it is located, but it can only be maintained in perfect efficiency by the joint continuous efforts of all the inhabitants of this province, and especially of the inhabitants of an important town like yours. Meanwhile, you will not fail to keep efficient your system of primary and intermediate education on which you have hitherto bestowed all the attention it requires." The italics are of course ours. It will be seen from the italicised portion of the extract that according to His Excellency's view it is the duty of the leading municipalities to contribute according to their means for the maintenance in an efficient condition of educational institutions other than those for primary education, even when those institutions are located outside their local jurisdiction. His Excellency, when speaking at Sukkur, was doubtless giving expression not to his individual views but to those of the Government over which he presides. And yet we find His Excellency's Government opposed to hand over the Ahmednagar High School to the local municipality in response to an offer from that body ; and in the same way we find it opposed to accept an offer of pecuniary assistance from the municipality for the continued maintenance of the local high school in an efficient condition. Surely there cannot be one set of principles for the province of Sind and another for the presidency division proper. The Poona Municipality was recently told that until it had placed the sanitary condition of Poona on a satisfactory basis, Government could not allow it to spend even a few thousand rupees, say one-fiftieth of its total income, on secondary education, while the head of the same Government could not only notice with pleasure the grant by the Sukkur Municipality of Rs. 5,000 and Rs. 2,000 to the Sind Arts College and the Mahomedan Madressa at Karáchi, respectively, but could afford to exhort the leading municipalities to continue to do so, and could see nothing to find fault with in the fact that the municipality he was directly addressing was spending one-fourth of its total revenues on education alone, although the requirements of the local population, so far as the abundant supply of pure drinking water—the first element in the sanitary condition of a town—is concerned, were left unprovided for. Surely inconsistency itself cannot go further than this.

A prayer to appoint specialists to the different chairs in the Grant Medical College, Bombay.

50. In noticing the remarks made by His Excellency Lord Reay in his speech at the laying of the foundation-stone of the Frámji Dinshaw Petit Laboratory for Scientific Medical Research that without such a laboratory it was vain to expect the Professors to discharge their duties properly, and that with such an institution the students of the Grant Medical College would have their task materially lightened, the Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 11th April, says that one more important arrangement in connection with this College remains to be made, and that is the abolition of the monopoly of the professorships by the Government medical service and the appointment of specialists of European or Indian fame to the different chairs. The paper adds that if His Excellency makes this important arrangement before his departure from India, he will render a valuable service to the cause of medical education in this presidency.

The Rájkumár College, Rájkot, and the necessity for reforming its constitution.

51. The Rájyabhakt (126), in its issue of the 9th April, points out the necessity for reforming the constitution of the Rájkumár College, Rájkot, which it thinks defective, complains of the heavy expenditure the students have to incur, and says that some of the petty tálukdárs have to run into debt, the cost of education being not less than Rs. 3,000 per annum while their tálukás yield an annual income of from Rs. 8,000 to Rs. 10,000. It remarks that such petty tálukdárs ought to be sent to the tálukdári schools in Wadhwán and Sádra, which are better managed than the Rájkumár College, that Government should issue a resolution to this effect, that the petty tálukdár of Dedán was fined by the Political Agent for his reluctance to send his son, Rámkotila, to the College owing to this heavy expenditure, and that this action is unjust.

PART IV.—Railways.

The unsatisfactory arrangements on the Vánkáner-Rájkot section of the Morvi Railway.

52. The Káthiáwár Times (81), in its issue of the 7th April, writes:—As the opening of the Vánkáner-Rájkot section of the Morvi Railway line is likely to attract a large number of visitors to Káthiáwár, we think it would be better if steps were taken to improve the carriages and erect decent stations with commodious and comfortable waiting rooms at all places on the line. The erection of sign-posts to serve for stations looks absurdly ridiculous, and the present arrangements on the line are not very satisfactory. The temporary miserable shed which serves as a station at Wadhwán should be forthwith demolished and a decent station with a couple of waiting-rooms erected in its stead.

PART V.—Municipalities.

The lepers in the city of Bombay and the necessity for taking prompt action.

53. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 7th April, writes:—Mr. Kirkham ought to be thanked for his crusade against a crying nuisance in Bombay on re-entering the civic parliament. The presence of leprosy in our midst, more of it hidden from the hasty glance, is a real danger to the community and a source of unavoidable suffering to the victims themselves. We have known the evil to be so wide-reaching—and we speak from experience of many parts of the country—that we think the Government of India are wanting in duty as they sit indulging in platitudes of helplessness. There are evils which no considerations of money ought to deter a government from holding in check. What do we see here, instead? Starving the rayat out of his pinch of salt, and then telling him that they cannot help it if he is attacked by disease. And we have 'representatives of the people' in the Viceregal Council assuring His Excellency that enhanced salt-duty does not affect the people, but that it is the income-tax that ought to be removed, of course in the interests of the people. Poor Government of India! And poor children of the soil! But before the Government and the people understand each other, it is well that citizens like Messrs. Kirkham and Dosábhái Frámji appeal to the sympathy of the elect ones of the people themselves.

Segregation of lepers in the city of Bombay and the local municipality.

54. The Native Opinion (14) of the 7th April is opposed to any legislative enactment empowering both the police and the municipality of Bombay to compel the necessary segregation of lepers in the city, as it considers it possible that the investing them with such powers might prove to be an engine of oppression in their hands and says:—The best way to effect the contemplated segregation is the establishment of an asylum for these helpless people, where competent medical treatment, combined with the provision of other flesh comforts, might induce the lepers of their own free will to seek refuge and thus relieve the city population of a pestilential disease. It seems that few lepers seek refuge in the asylum established by Father Meurin, perhaps owing to religious scruples. If the Bombay Municipal Corporation feels persuaded to devise any such permanent scheme, we think it ought to make religious neutrality a distinctive feature of the new institution.

55. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 8th April, writes:—The new Bombay Municipal Corporation has done well in adopting a resolution for the purpose of mitigating the leper nuisance in the city and for giving relief to the unfortunate sufferers. The repulsive details given by Mr Kirkham, Dr. Blaney and Mr. Dosábhái Frámji, and which are within the experience of every passer-by in the streets, ought to arouse public attention to the gravity of the evil. The unrestrained moving about of lepers in the public streets and at places of public resort, especially in the neighbourhood of schools and market-places, is fraught with great danger to public health and the earliest steps should be taken to abate the nuisance. The segregation of lepers is desirable in the interests quite as much of those miserable beings as of the healthy public, and from the inquiries already made it seems that both the Police and the Health Department are powerless to take any effective measures. It is highly expedient that they should be put in a position to afford the necessary relief. For that purpose the cautious proposal of Mr. Kirkham to enquire of the Health Department what powers it wants in the matter is an excellent beginning. The proposal of Mr. Master to ask Government to give the necessary power for the removal of lepers, the municipality undertaking to provide for their maintenance, would have committed the Corporation to an unlimited amount of expenditure. Let us now hope that some practical action will be promptly taken on Mr. Kirkham's proposal.

Election of Mr. Geary as President of the new Municipal Corporation, Bombay, approved.

56. The same newspaper writes:—The new Bombay Municipal Corporation has elected Mr. Grattan Geary as its President, and we are glad to say that no more deserving choice could have been made. Mr. Geary's success was assured from the moment his name was put forth, and at last Thursday's meeting, by the timely retirement of the Honourable Mr. Sayáni, Mr. Geary's election was, so to say, a mere walk over. Mr. Geary has fully merited this expression of confidence from the Corporation. He has been a regular, steady and earnest member of the Corporation. His election as President is a recognition of a long course of municipal services. His opinions on municipal matters have not indeed always been in conformity with the prevailing Native public opinion; but whatever differences of opinion there might have been, he has always borne a free, independent and prominent part in the municipal debates. He has all the ability and experience necessary to make a good president, and we venture to promise for him that he will fill his office with honour to himself and to the Corporation. [Several other papers also approve of Mr. Geary's election as President of the new Municipal Corporation.]

The proposed increase in the Bombay police force and the proposal to ask the local municipality to contribute towards the consequent increase in expenditure.

57. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 7th April, points out the necessity for increasing the Bombay police force and observes that if it is not mistaken the Government have taken over charge of the Bombay police with the express understanding not to ask for any contribution towards the expense of the police and relieved themselves of all educational responsibility in exchange, and that it has no doubt that when the question is brought before the Bombay Municipal Corporation with a view perhaps to ask a contribution from the municipality to cover a probable increase on account of the additional police, due notice will be taken of the question whether under the new arrangement the municipality can still be made responsible for any increase in the police expenditure of the city.

The powers of the Municipal Commissioner of Bombay under the new Municipal Act.

58. The Din Bandhu (7), in its issue of the 7th April, writes:—Under the old Act land required for set-back purposes in Bombay could only be acquired by the consent of the Town Council and a useful check was thus imposed on the municipal executive in this respect. The new Municipal Act gives to the Municipal Commissioner absolute power to acquire such lands. May he exercise this power mercifully! The civic fathers and the Legislative Councillors were tinkering and fashioning the new Act for months with the view of restraining the powers of the Commissioner. In the words of the proverb, they would not allow a needle to go, but have at last blindly permitted an elephant to pass.

The recent disastrous fires at Surat and the inaction of the local municipality.

59. The Gujarát Darpan (75), in its issue of the 11th April, writes:—The recent disastrous fires at Surat which continually raged for three days have reduced to ashes the most bustling centre of our commerce and indigenous industry. The police with the assistance of the military did what they could. The Collector's absence was much felt. The telegraphic summary despatched from Surat to the Bombay English dailies goes to say that the municipality did almost nothing. The want of good fire-engines and sufficient water is attributable to the unwise economy of our commissioners. If more work but less talk and less hair-splitting had been the order of municipal proceedings in the past, much of the danger could have been avoided. But we feel grieved to recall the past and hope that the new corporation under the presidency of the Collector will do its utmost towards the well-being of the poor ratepayers. In its Gujaráti columns the same paper urges upon the municipality the necessity for anyhow constructing water-works, complains of the delay of three days made by Mr. Crawley-Boevey in returning to Surat from hunting though a telegram was sent to him, and of his Assistant, Mr. Winchester, having, it is said, proceeded direct to Bombay from Sachin on the day the fire occurred, and praises His Excellency Lord Reay for his visit to Surat and remarks that His Excellency has thereby laid the local public under obligation. [The Surat Akhbár (83), in its issue of the 8th April, says that the telephone ought to be speedily introduced into the town, that the municipality ought to buy about 40 small fire-engines and keep them at short distances in various parts of the town, and that those who courageously exert themselves to put out fires should be duly rewarded by way of encouragement to others. The Deshi Mitră (98), in its issue of the 11th April, praises His Excellency Lord Reay for his visit to Surat on hearing of the disastrous fire there, and says that Government should help the people by allowing them to take away bamboos and other timber of small value from the forests, that they should give pecuniary aid to the municipality for constructing water-works, that in case they cannot do so they should allow the municipality to hold a lottery for the purpose, that the municipality should strengthen and improve the fire-brigade, that a fire-engine should be kept at every police station, that hay, &c., should not be permitted to be stored in houses, that the municipality should have houses built of better materials than at present, and that it should request Government to stop the construction of flood-works. The Rájyabhakt (126), in its issue of the 9th April, suggests that Government should help the people of Surat and that they should do away with the income-tax in that town. The three Gujaráti dailies of this week record with great regret the destructive fires at Surat, severely censure the municipal corporation of that city for failing to provide proper appliances for extinguishing fires, and exhort the public of Bombay and other places to subscribe liberally in aid of the sufferers by the extensive conflagrations.]

Praise of His Excellency Lord Reay for his visit to Surat during the recent fire.

60. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 11th April, writes:—His Excellency Lord Reay was on the scene of disaster on the 9th instant, and by his sympathetic conduct towards the swarm of sufferers who gathered around him he stimulated their drooping spirits. His Excellency's visit will have other moral effects of its own. It will set astir the lethargic spirits of some and put fresh vigour into the already enthusiastic ones of others. His telling, though polite, rebuke to the municipal commissioners of Surat who went to receive him on the station must bear its fruits too in due time. The fire-extinguishing arrangements of the municipality were in the most miserable condition. Most of the pumps were in disorder. If we look to the past history of Surat we shall find that this is not the first time when a calamity like the above has visited it. Fire and flood have ere now laid it under contribution. Such contingencies every prudent municipality arms itself against. The remissness, therefore, on the part of the municipal commissioners of Surat in this respect cannot be too much deprecated. Let us hope that along with the houses and shops our Surat commissioners' apathy and want of forethought also have been embraced by the last huge flames.

The wheel-tax and toll and the Surat Municipality.

61. The Suryá Prakásh (84), in its issue of the 6th April, writes:—We are surprised and sorry to see that the municipal corporators of Surat do not understand the objects of wheel-tax and toll, though the municipal affairs have been under Native administration for the last five years. It is quite unjust to impose toll upon those persons who pay the wheel-tax. The principles upon which the wheel-tax and toll should be levied and collected are (1) that the owners of carts and carriages residing within the jurisdiction of the municipality should be charged with the wheel-tax, and (2) that the carts and conveyances loaded with commodities of trade entering the municipal limits from surrounding villages should be charged with toll. From this it will be perceived that the Surat Municipality was quite wrong when it passed a resolution in disregard of these principles. We therefore trust that our energetic Collector will, with a view to relieve hack-cart owners and traders from undue and crushing imposition of a duplex tax, distinctly decline to forward this resolution of the corporation to Government—a resolution, we repeat, quite misleading, mischievous and objectionable in every way.

Co-ordinate action in local matters recommended.

62. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 8th April, says that the work of the Indian National Congress would be much facilitated if the different municipalities were to devise and practically adopt a scheme of co-ordinate action in local matters, and suggests that the chairmen and members of the principal municipalities should make it a point to meet every year in a separate meeting, fix a programme of work, discuss it at the Congress and then agitate at their respective local centres for the reforms proved to be necessary. It adds that Government will then be forced to consider proposals coming to them from different centres charged with the force of unanimity.

A suggestion to make education the chief qualification for the office of municipal commissioner.

63. The Shri Shiváji (60), in its issue of the 5th April, referring to the recent municipal elections at different places, remarks that a large number of the elected members have no educational status and that there is fear of the number of such representatives increasing every year, and suggests as a remedial measure a short enactment specifying the qualifications necessary for the office of a municipal commissioner. This enactment, continues the paper, should make education the chief qualification in the aspirant for municipal honours. The standard of educational fitness need not be the same in all places, but may vary according as the municipality is in an advanced city or in a backward place and may be left to the local municipalities to be determined.

The alleged corruption in the recent municipal elections at Poona.

64. The Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 11th April, writes:—We understand that in forwarding to Government a report on the recent municipal elections at Poona the local authorities have made a serious allegation affecting those gentlemen who came forward as candidates, more presumably affecting those who have been declared as duly elected members of the local municipality. The serious allegation is to the effect that a good deal of money was spent in purchasing votes; that, in short, a good deal of corruption prevailed in connection with the recent elections. The practices referred to, even assuming for the sake of argument that they did prevail, are not, it must be remembered, specifically declared to be illegal under the existing law; and accordingly a suggestion is thrown out by the reporting authorities that before the next triennial elections take place such practices should be actually suppressed by declaring them to be illegal. It is understood that Government have expressed their displeasure at the reported prevalence of the practices. It is at this stage that the matter rests at present; but we are disposed to think that it ought not to be allowed to rest there. The practices in question, even if not illegal at present, are doubtless very immoral, and it is certainly neither desirable nor expedient that a serious imputation about the prevalence of such immoral practices should be left hanging over an administrative body like the municipal corporation of an important town like Poona. The nature and extent of the evil, if it really exists, ought to be forthwith ascertained, while all the facts connected with the recent municipal elections are still fresh. We accordingly demand, in the name and on behalf of the several constituencies whose reputation is at stake, that no time ought to be lost in appointing a small committee with power to sift the matter to the very bottom and submit a detailed report to Government on the subject. The reporting authorities who have made the above-mentioned imputation cannot, it may be reasonably presumed, have made it on the strength of mere idle gossip in the bázár; they must have some evidence in their possession, and this evidence, whatever its value, ought to be forthwith subjected to independent scrutiny. Such an inquiry, if it should result in proving the existence of the alleged immoral practices, will be very useful in two ways at least; in the first place, it will lay bare the nature and extent of the evil, and, in the second place, it will enable the Legislature to provide adequate remedies. The purity of the municipal administration must be placed beyond all reproach involved in an imputation of such a serious character as the one referred to above. A corporation which includes among its members those who are alleged to have obtained their entrance into it by resorting to such corrupt practices will not, and cannot, command the same confidence and respect as a body against which no such allegation is made. What gives the imputation a serious aspect is that it is made by responsible authorities who wield intermediate responsible powers over the administration of the very body which they believe to have been constituted in the manner the allegation implies. If such an imputation had emanated from interested quarters, it would not have been imperative on the corporation to take any notice of it. But as the matter now stands, we fail to see how it can afford to treat such an imputation with unconcern. We think it is obligatory on the corporation to submit a respectful representation to Government, requesting it forthwith to appoint a committee for investigating fully into the allegations. Like the corporation the public too have a duty to perform in this connection, and that duty, according to our judgment, lies in the submission of a respectful prayer to Government for adopting the necessary measures to enquire into the truth or otherwise of the allegations officially made.

The idea of a regular system of drainage for Karáchi considered premature.

65. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 6th April, writes:—As yet the idea of any system of drainage, surface or subsoil, for a city so incompletely developed, even if nascent, like Karáchi, appears to us to be extremely premature. We have only to look around us to satisfy ourselves that the time has not come when we want drainage on anything like a scientific basis. There is nothing like solidarity about the town. The Camp for all intents and purposes could be completely isolated from the town, the Civil Lines from the Camp, the Runchore Lines from the Civil Lines, and so on. A system of drainage to unite all these quarters would have to be maintained at great expense without any adequate return either to the funds of the municipality or to the health of the citizens. Nature in Karáchi declares against an extensive introduction of drains at present. The rainfall is scanty, and the town is quite dry all the year round. What is really wanted is not a regular system of drainage, but an improvement in other conservancy services and a few local drains wherever they may be useful. When Karáchi becomes twice as large as now, and the conglomeration of detached quarters fills out into a solid, crowded mass of houses, then it will be quite time to think of giving a regular system of drainage to the city. At present there are numerous minor things to which the municipality might give its attention and which would really improve the health of the city more speedily and surely than an expensive and experimental system of drainage.

Kashmere and a request to Government to declare publicly the reasons that necessitate a change in its administration.

66. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 6th April, writes:—We learn that the Government of India have decided to entrust the affairs of the Kashmere State to a Council, and to invest the Resident with larger powers than he has hitherto enjoyed. If this intelligence is true, then the Government owe it to the Kashmere State as much as to themselves to declare publicly the intended change as well as the reasons that necessitate it. The treaty rights enjoyed by the Kashmere State were conferred in public, and any modification of those rights should also be made in public. It has been alleged that the Mahárája is a consenting party to the change, but that in no way changes the position of the Government and they cannot shirk their clear duty towards the subjects of the Kashmere Government and also towards themselves. The Mahárája's consent to such a change cannot be legal. It is not a personal belonging or self-acquired property that he is asked to part with, but a family right which belongs to his heirs as much as to himself and which he cannot give away. Besides, the Mahárája's consent might be simply due to his anxiety to avoid some worse evil. He is not credited either with much intelligence or courage, and he might have simply accepted such a proposal to avoid personal humiliation, regardless of the consequences that such a change would bring about. He may be perfectly indifferent to the interests of his heirs and may be simply anxious to avoid personal disgrace. At any rate it is evident that his consent to the establishment of a Regency Council and the amplification of the powers of the Resident cannot in any way affect the rights of his heirs, and the Government cannot modify or violate treaty rights except in public and with a public statement of the grounds upon which they feel themselves justified in making a change. So far there is no reason to assume that the Government have proposed any radical change in Kashmere. On the contrary, they have made light of the whole affair from the beginning. The Government can, if they so wish, both strengthen the administration of Kashmere and eradicate some of the growing evils of the State without interfering with the treaty rights of the Mahárája. Up to this time, however, no disposition has been shown to assist the Mahárája, and the State has been allowed to drift from bad to worse without a finger being raised to warn or help the Kashmere Government. The attitude maintained towards the State has been one of suspicion and not of sympathy and co-operation. If His Excellency the Viceroy could take matters out of the hands of the Foreign Office even for a while, it would be probably found that the Kashmere State has been as much sinned against as it may be sinning.

The political officers of the Government of India and their attitude towards Native States.

67. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 7th April, writes:—To us who live in British territory under the protecting arm of the law it is altogether inconceivable how the political officers of the Government of India sent to Native States as representatives of the paramount power very soon develop into tyrants. Particularly do we find the Central India States the scene of many a disgraceful act of open zulum on the part of the Political Agents. The latest instance of this kind was some time back mentioned by the Eastern Herald of Mhow. It referred to a peremptory order which the Political Agent of Bhopawar made the Mahárája of Burwani to issue, calling upon one Mr. Mohendranath Chatterjee, Pleader of Mhow, who had gone to Burwani for some business of his own connected with the paper Eastern Herald, "immediately to withdraw and to return to Mhow without delay." Mr. Chatterjee was not to be brow-beaten like that. He replied to His Highness the Mahárája that the order was primâ facie contrary to the laws of any country. He said he would ask the Political Agent an explanation, and if the same were not satisfactory he would represent the matter to the Agent to the Governor-General. He also sent a letter to the Political Agent explaining why he had gone to Burwani, protesting against the insinuation that he had gone there for some political intrigue, and declaring his determination to stay there until his recovery, for he was then a little ill. He moreover demanded an apology, and if the order of the Mahárája were not withdrawn, he was to take notice that he (Mr. Chatterjee) would file a civil suit against him claiming Rs. 20,000 as damages for injury done to his reputation. In reply, the Agent declined to reconsider the previous orders. Mr. Chatterjee then held the notice of a civil suit as duly served on him. Further than this we do not know; but it is alleged that Colonel Muir, the Political Agent, will be examined before a Medical Board. Why? Probably to give him some excuse for leaving the country and escaping from the consequences of his rash and unwarranted act.

The Cambay Darbár and the Political Agent and Collector, Mr. Allen.

68. The Svadesh Bandhu (136), in its issue of the 10th April, strongly disapproves of the Cambay Darbár having incurred a large expenditure on account of the reception of the Political Agent and Collector, Mr. W. Allen, and having wasted large sums of public money in fire-works and illuminations in his honour, and says that such things are usually done by clever officials to curry favour and to cover their misdeeds. The State treasury, adds the paper, is by no means in a satisfactory condition and therefore such lavish expenditure for useless purposes ought not to have been incurred. The paper calls the attention of Mr. W. Allen to the impropriety of allowing such a reception to be got up in his honour, and hopes that he will direct his attention next time to this matter and put a stop to this ruinous practice.

The alleged oppression to which the Thákor of Gángad has been subjected and the inattention of Government to it.

69. The Hitechchhu (79) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 11th April, says:—For a long time past the rupture between Mr. Hiráchand Velji, the Head Kárkun of Gángad, and Thákor Nánbha Gagubha has been widening. Grave accusations such as having misappropriated large sums of money, misleading Kuvarba, the mother of the Thákor, and fomenting quarrels between the two, and joining the Vávdevála, who is the opposing party, have been preferred against the Head Kárkun, and it is surprising that the attention of Government should not have been drawn to even one of these complaints. We are surprised that the authorities should insist upon retaining Hiráchand at his post when such a serious disagreement exists between him and the Thákor and when the latter has openly expressed his fear of being killed by Hiráchand. If Mr. James, Collector of Ahmedabad, will be good enough to communicate to us the reason of his inattention to the matter we shall be glad to publish the same. It seems that the Thákor's mother has gone over to Hiráchand's side. The obstinacy shown by the authorities in spite of the fear openly expressed by the Thákor of being murdered by Hiráchand is likely to lead the people to the inference that the authorities are purposely encouraging and bringing about some grave result. The public guess that such a just officer as Mr. Sheppard, Commissioner, N. D., has been misled by one-sided accounts. It will throw a great slur on Government should the fear expressed by the Thákor be realized, and hence it is to be hoped that Government will either order an early enquiry into the matter or remove Hiráchand Velji from Gángad. [A correspondent, writing to the same paper, says that Government should not attach any importance to the evidence given by Mr. Pestonji Jehángir, Tálukdári Settlement Officer, against Mr. Nánbha, as it is inconsistent with his evidence given before the 1st Class Subordinate Judge some time ago, and attributes motives to Mr. Pestonji. The Gujarát Gazette (76), in its issue of the 11th April, makes an appeal to the Government for the dismissal of Mr. Hiráchand Velji, as it would be for the good of the State as well as of himself.]

The people and the Native States of Káthiáwár and a petition prepared by the editor and proprietor of the Rájyabhakt newspaper for presentation to His Excellency Lord Reay on their behalf.

70. The Rájyabhakt (126), in its issue of the 9th April, gives a further instalment of the petition prepared by its editor and proprietor for presentation to His Excellency Lord Reay on behalf of the people and Native Princes of Káthiáwár, takes Jámnagar in hand, and says that the people of Jámnagar are as bad off as those of Bhávnagar, that the conduct of His Highness the Jám is as bad as that of His Highness the Thákor of Bhávnagar, that many complaints are made against the woman Jánbái, who does not belong to a higher caste than the woman Kaisar of Bhávnagar, that the khavás (personal attendant) Rághav harasses the people, that Mr. Maganlál is unfit to continue as Diván, that the State has run into debt, and that a commission composed of independent men should be speedily appointed to enquire into the grievances of the people and the state of affairs in Káthiáwár.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Part I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

The duty on Indian silver plate and the injustice done to India.

1. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 13th April, writes:—Some correspondence on the silver plate duties between the India Office and the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury has just seen the light and will prove very interesting reading. It is in instances like these that we can fully realise the glaring injustice which is done to India on every possible occasion. The Government of India often try faithfully to protect the interests of this country, but they are absolutely powerless whenever these are brought into conflict with the interests of the trade in England or other vested interests. India has been always treated as a milch-cow who can be never drained dry, and the protesting Government have been repeatedly compelled to bear the expenses of expeditions, wars, &c., in which they had no hand whatever and no interest. If the duty on silver plate had been an Indian instead of an English duty, it may be easily conceived how rapidly it would have been repealed. When the Government of India levied a duty on imported piece-goods, they were never given any rest until that duty was abolished. Just now a powerful attempt is being made to force the English factory legislation on India without regard to any local considerations. But if the Government of India venture to protest against the levy of an English duty on imported Indian silver-ware they are met with a high-flown, evasive reply, or one in a tone of injured dignity which effectually silences them. Notwithstanding the undoubted generosity and philanthropy of the British people the instinct of money-making is strong in them, and whenever the interests of trade are at stake it is hopeless to expect any sacrifice from them. But in this case no sacrifice is demanded, but only justice and equitable taxation. It is no fault of the Government of India that their protest has fallen upon deaf ears. Whatever faults may be laid at their door, it is undeniable that in all transactions with the Home Government they loyally try to protect the interests of India.

The decision of the Secretary of State for India in the Crawford case criticized.

2. The Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 19th April, says:—The substance of the Secretary of State's decision in the Crawford case is to the effect that the opinion formed on the case by the Bombay Government is not altogether fanciful, but that Government was not in a position to pass a sound opinion on it. Whatever Europeans may think of this dictum, the Natives regret that it should have been pronounced. No one else than the Bombay Government itself is more competent to make careful enquiries into the conduct of its own servants, and when the opinion formed by that Government after such enquiries has not been accepted, injustice has been done to it. The Secretary of State for India seems to entertain the opinion that the Bombay Government has committed a mistake in enquiring into and forming an opinion on the question whether Mr. Crawford was given to corruption, but by doing so Lord Cross appears to have overlooked the effect that would be produced on the public mind by his placing the Bombay Government in such a position as this. The Natives are not less sorry than Europeans for the severe punishment meted out to Mr. Crawford.

3. The Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the same date, says:—Government were aware of the indebtedness of Mr. Crawford and were right in trying to prevent the continuance of the evil in the interests of the service to which he belonged. This could have been achieved with the same result as has been now arrived at, by calling upon Mr. Crawford to furnish an explanation on the subject and by drawing the attention of the Secretary of State for India to it, saving thereby the great cost of time and money now incurred and avoiding putting an already involved officer to heavy expenditure. Instead of adopting this course Lord Reay's Government took, by the wrong advice of some high officials, the improper course of promising immunity from harm to a number of self-incriminated subordinate officials in order to ascertain whether their superior officer was guilty of corruption. There was no need of giving such a promise, as Mr. Crawford could have been got rid of by bringing his heavy indebtedness to the notice of Lord Cross, and at the same time the self-incriminated Mámlatdárs could have been duly punished by their criminal prosecution.

Mr. Crawford enjoys much public sympathy, because when he should have been pensioned off for his indebtedness Government condoned his offence and indirectly encouraged him to continue to run the reckless course of incurring fresh debts, and at last turned against him and dismissed him from the service without giving him the pension which he had earned by his long and meritorious services to the State. The public will be glad to hear that some provision has been made for the maintenance of this old and able but reckless officer. [The Akhbáre Sodágar (87), in its issues of the 19th and 20th April, expresses some of the above sentiments.]

4. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 18th April, writes:—We understand that Mr. Crawford is dismissed from the service. The resolution of the Secretary of State for India is not yet formally out; but it is strongly believed that he accepts the report of the Commission, acquits Mr. Crawford of the serious charges brought against him, but dismisses him for his indebtedness which was in contravention of Act XXXVII. of 1850. If this is a fact, we find ourselves in a happy position to declare that the general rule of the acquittal of high European officials is not so invariable as never to admit of an exception. Whatever his moral shortcomings may be, Mr. Crawford is indeed an intellectual giant; and in recording this fate of Mr. Crawford we cannot help remarking that a great man has fallen. The Native public has a right to know the report of the Commissioners, the review of the Bombay Government thereon, and the final decision of the Secretary of State, and we hope His Excellency Lord Reay will fully gratify it.

5. The Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 15th April, writes:—The report of the Crawford Commission, with the Bombay Government's observations thereon, was received in London on the 18th ultimo, and the despatch containing Lord Cross's decision thereon left London by the mail of the 29th ultimo, that is, Lord Cross arrived at his decision within ten days from the receipt of the papers in the case. This fact alone is sufficient to raise a strong presumption that Lord Cross has fully endorsed the finding of the Commission, whatever it may really be. That finding is, however, understood to be unexpectedly favourable to the distinguished officer, so far as the more serious charges brought against him are concerned. Be that as it may, it is equally patent from the foregoing fact that Lord Cross must have very probably refused to take into consideration, in arriving at his decision, the other material which the Bombay Government is understood to have placed before him—material other than the cases gone into before the Commission and which is believed to have been the basis of the Bombay Government's refusal to accept the finding of the Commission. If our forecast in this respect be correct,—and the reader will remember that this is not the first time that we have indicated the impropriety of the procedure which the Bombay Government is understood to have followed in this respect,—then there need be no reason to be surprised at the result; for if it be otherwise, it would be laying a precedent full of peril and inconvenience, in so far that you can convict a man on charges to which he was never required to plead.

6. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 15th April, says:—The London correspondent of the Bombay Gazette telegraphs that the decision of the Secretary of State for India in the Crawford case is adverse to Mr. Crawford. This is considered by some as too good to be true, and it is feared that the version which appears in the Times of India may be more in accordance with facts. If it is true, however, it will be a rare vindication of justice. We do not look upon it as an occasion for exultation or rejoicing, but nothing will be more acceptable to the Native public than that the British administration should be for ever thoroughly purified and the name of British justice put beyond the reach of cant and reproach. It is yet too early to speak out our mind on the subject. The decision of Lord Cross will be in the hands of the Government of Bombay in a day or two and will be communicated to Parliament to-morrow. It will thus be published here during the course of the week. The public has therefore to patiently wait for some time before the authentic report appears. Meanwhile let us hope that the expectations raised by the correspondent of the Bombay Gazette will be realized.

7. The Sudhárak (17), in its issue of the 15th April, writes:—The London correspondent of the Bombay Gazette telegraphs that the Secretary of State for India has at last given his decision in the Crawford case, and that it is adverse to the accused. All right-minded people in this presidency, and indeed throughout the whole country, will utter a sigh of relief when this intelligence reaches them. The despatch from Lord Cross containing his decision is to arrive in Bombay by to-day's mail, and to-morrow a copy of it will be laid on the table of the House of Commons. We may therefore look for very interesting and possibly sensational news during the course of this week. The case is no longer sub-judice, and comments which would have been improper before this time are now perfectly legitimate. The first thing then that we have to say is that we have lost all faith in Commissions composed of outside men, as the one in this case was. The Native public, and we believe the European public too, in this presidency,—at least in two divisions of this presidency,—were perfectly aware of the corrupt practices of Mr. Crawford. A system of purchase and sale, regularly after the bazar fashion, could not be expected to be carried on except under the eyes of the public. And the saddest part of the whole thing is that the man who prostituted his great talents and his high position for the sake of these immoral, dishonourable and disloyal gains had grown absolutely callous to all comments on his shocking conduct, so much so indeed that once he went the length, we are told, of asking a friend in the most brazen-faced manner whether he knew what gossips were saying; and on the friend answering in the negative, he told him that the people said that the Crawford Market of Bombay was a market only in name, and that the real Crawford Market lay in Poona; and then with admirable taste he joined in the laughter against himself! Such a man was tried by this Commission. And what was the result of the inquiry? The Commission, we are told, came to the conclusion that the graver charges of corruption were not substantiated! And this too in the face of the overwhelming evidence considered to be unimpeachable by the lay public—unimpeachable, at any rate, so far as is possible in a case like this, adduced by the prosecution before the Commission. Not that the conclusions to which the Commission had come were absolutely unexpected by the public; for before the inquiry had considerably progressed, the attitude of two of the three Commissioners—the Honourable Mr. Justice Wilson and the Honourable Mr. Quinton—towards the prosecution was such as to create distrust in the public mind. Still, not quite unexpected as the conclusions of the Commission were, when their purport became first known they created a wide alarm that justice was going to shamefully fail in the case. It would indeed have been a very cruel irony of fate if Mr. Crawford, whose guilt was the greatest as it was the most notorious, had been able to get away, while humbler persons, guilty no doubt, but guilty in varying measures and in a lesser degree, had been all indiscriminately mowed down. But happily the Bombay Government rose equal to the doubly difficult task laid on it by the Commission, and the result is that all unscrupulous efforts to defeat the ends of justice, which unfortunately received additional encouragement and help from "judicial denunciations" and the disinterested regard for "equity and even-handed justice" of a seller of tobacco, have ignominiously failed. We are not at all sorry for this deserved fall of Mr. Crawford, and we only wish that the punishment meted out to him will not be so inadequate as to fail to satisfy the serious requirements of the case. That the Secretary of State for India should have manifested such admirable strength of character, that he should not have allowed himself to be led astray by the misrepresentations of Mr. Crawford's friends which were as malicious as they were persistent, is indeed what we had not, we must confess, ventured to expect from the manner in which he disposed of the case against Mr. Wilson. Perhaps Lord Cross thought his overriding the conclusions of the local Government in the Wilson case was too exceptional a procedure to be safely repeated. Perhaps the disrepute into which the present Ministry has fallen owing to the questionable part it has played in the Parnell inquiry required in this case an extraordinary degree of regard for the claims of justice. Perhaps the Government of Bombay placed its convictions before Lord Cross in so clear a light that a dissent from them, even with the help of the Commission's report, was impossible. Be the reason what it may, the decision of the Secretary of State is eminently satisfactory to the public. We wish that the Government of Bombay will see its way to publish the whole literature with regard to this case, the report of the Commission, its own comments thereon, and the despatch embodying the Secretary of State's decision. The public will then be in a position to see clearly how the Commission discharged its solemn duties, and how the Government of Bombay successfully struggled against calumny, unscrupulousness and fraud.

The decision of Lord Cross about the corrupt Mámlatdárs concerned in the Crawford case and observations thereon.

8. The same newspaper writes:—The decision of Lord Cross about the corrupt Mámlatdárs is entirely satisfactory. We have always urged that Government, while scrupulously respecting the pledges given by itself, must make a difference in the treatment of the various classes of offenders, and that the public will not tolerate the idea of a Dabir being treated with the same leniency as a Sindekar. Of course, the case of those who have not yet confessed their misdeeds is clear enough. They have seriously aggravated their offence by trying to conceal it even under the most favourable circumstances, and they ought to be, therefore, one and all, dismissed from the service of the State, or even criminally proceeded against. But we say once more that 'scamps' ought to be separated from the 'victims.' [The Rást Goftár (82), in its issue of the 14th April, says that it is the duty of Government to dismiss from the service all those Mámlatdárs who have admitted giving bribes, that by way of pardon they may not be criminally proceeded against, and that they may be given pecuniary compensation if Government have promised to protect them from harm. The Kaiser-i-Hind (111) of the 14th April regrets that the Secretary of State for India has not ordered the dismissal of the corrupt Mámlatdárs from the service, thinks that Government will perhaps degrade them, and remarks that pure justice cannot be expected from such men.]

9. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 15th April, writes:—In regard to the disposal of the Mámlatdárs' cases Lord Cross leaves to Lord Reay ample discretion. His Lordship admits the importance of respecting the pledges given, but suggests removal from judicial offices on certain terms of remuneration. If rumour is to be believed, the Bombay Government had already made up its mind to act upon this advice. We have heard from a credible source that Government proposes to remove all the offending Mámlatdárs from their present posts, pensioning some and transferring others. The work will involve a reorganisation of nearly the whole subordinate revenue service in at least two divisions of the presidency. Could not Government, as we suggested in a former issue, take advantage of this opportunity to introduce the reform of separation of judicial and revenue offices?

10. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 14th April, writes:—From Lord Cross's decision we understand that the Mámlatdárs need not be dismissed. At the worst they may be relieved of their magisterial duties. Looking to the circumstances of this Crawford matter, we wish His Excellency Lord Reay will exercise the discretion left to him in such a way as to prevent the shaking of public confidence in Government. The State Secretary's advice does not call for the Mámlatdárs' dismissal from office. If necessary the magisterial functions may be taken away, and those who may be so relieved may be compensated in the best way Lord Reay may think proper. There are posts in the Revenue Department which are as respectable as that of a Mámlatdár and which are still unconnected with any magisterial functions. To such posts these Mámlatdárs may be transferred, if at all necessary.

11. In alluding to the telegram from Lord Cross, the Secretary of State for India, to the Bombay Government, dated the 9th instant, about the disposal of the Mámlatdárs who, before the Crawford Commission, deposed to their giving bribes, the Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 15th April, says:—Lord Cross's decision on the subject is to the same effect as the Bombay Government intended to act and has to a large extent carried out its intention. Those who hitherto reproached the Bombay Government will now see their mistake, while His Excellency Lord Reay's administration, that showed exemplary patience under the abuse that was showered on its head, will be gratified at the support received by it from the Secretary of State for India.

12. Referring to the telegram from Lord Cross to Lord Reay about the corrupt Mámlatdárs, the Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 15th April, writes:—This message constitutes the strongest vindication of the action taken in November last by Justices Birdwood and Jardine— an action which the Bombay Government very injudiciously stigmatised at the time as an "unjudicial denunciation." And looking to the attitude of the Bombay Government against these two Judges of the local High Court, we should be inclined to fancy that the message will in certain quarters be regarded as the bitterest pill offered to the Bombay Government to swallow. This thing is certain that, whatever they may do within the discretion allowed to them for fulfilling their obligations to these corrupt Mámlatdárs, the Bombay Government will not be permitted to retain them in the undisturbed exercise of their judicial functions. The public has a right to demand that these men be forthwith divested of their judicial functions. And so far the result will doubtless be regarded as satisfactory except by those who very probably regarded the phrase "No harm will come to you" as elastic enough to ensure to them not only the undisturbed enjoyment of their present status and emoluments, but also their subsequent promotion in due course. They will now for the first time realise that they have been so long dwelling in a fool's paradise. We do not in the slightest degree mean to insinuate that we regard the simple fact of these men having confessed to having purchased their appointments, promotions or transfers to healthy stations as a reproach to them. But what we certainly regard as a grievous reproach to them is that they should ever have stooped so low as to purchase these official favours. We had certainly a right to expect that most, if not all, of them would scornfully reject such means of securing official favours. So far then it is all right, but what about these men of low morals, as the Advocate-General would say, or the saintly scoundrels, as they may more aptly be described, who when the so-called loose system of appointments, promotions, &c., prevailed in the Central Division actively took advantage of the same, presumably in their own interests, by consenting to be the agents of Hanmantráo in his evil practices, and who, the moment they perceived that their nefarious practices had been known purchased their immunity from the inevitable consequences of their said practices by volunteering to play the part of infamous informers and spies? It would be cheating justice of its due if these men were allowed to escape with their whole skins, simply because they occupy posts not carrying with them any magisterial duties. If the Government pledges are to be violated so far as to deprive the corrupt Mámlatdárs of their judicial powers, the ends of justice would certainly in our judgment be better served by punishing these worse than corrupt men more heavily even if such a measure necessitated the payment of any compensation to them; otherwise it would be a scandal of the worst magnitude. We have only hurriedly and briefly indicated the points which the Bombay Government will have to duly consider in giving effect to the order of Lord Cross conveyed in the message of the 9th instant. And from this point of view we join the Bombay Gazette, which has now recognised the propriety of the step, in urging upon the Bombay Government the necessity for publishing the report of the Commission.

13. With reference to the report in a recent issue of the Indu Prakásh (12) that it is the intention of the Bombay Government to pension some and transfer to other posts others of the self-incriminated Mámlatdárs in the Crawford case, the Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 17th April, says:—If such a step as this is taken by the Bombay Government, the public of this presidency will be much dissatisfied. The crime perpetrated by these Mámlatdárs was of such a nature that they deserved to be criminally prosecuted, but since they gave their evidence upon a promise of immunity if they spoke the truth, their criminal prosecution ought not to be insisted on, but they should never be retained in Government service. Pensioning them would be a premium on crime, while transferring them to other posts would be lowering the Government service. For the sake of the promise of immunity they may be given a year's gratuity on dismissal from the service. [The Akhbáre Sodágar (87), in its issue of the 15th April, approves of the decision passed by Lord Cross in regard to the self-incriminated Mámlatdárs.]

Desirability of enquiries being instituted for ascertaining whether there are any other officers of Government who like Mr. Crawford are steeped in heavy debt.

14. The Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 20th April, says:—In approving the decision of the Secretary of State for India in the Crawford case, the St. James's Gazette has properly raised the question, Is Mr. Crawford's indebtedness a solitary instance or are there other officers who like him are steeped in heavy debt? It is a common talk that several officers of Government live in such an expensive style that their incomes are inadequate for their expenses, and various rumours are afloat in connection with them. It is therefore to be hoped that proper enquiries will be instituted by Government to ascertain whether there are any more officers who are guilty of the offence for which Mr. Crawford has been severely punished.

The Earl of Dufferin and his alleged mean conduct in connection with the Indian National Congress.

15. The Pratod (51), in its issue of the 15th April, writes:—We learn from the Star newspaper that the proofs of the anti-Congress pamphlet of Sir Auckland Colvin were revised by Lord Dufferin and that the St. Andrew's dinner speech of His Lordship in which he fulminated his anathemas against the Indian National Congress movement was made at the suggestion of the Secretary of State for India. We never expected such mean conduct on the part of Lord Dufferin. It was from the first a mistake to appoint him Governor-General of India. It is also a wonder that Lord Cross, whose knowledge of India and Indian affairs is almost nil, should have the mean audacity to secretly instigate Lord Dufferin to make shameless attacks on the Congress before he left India for good.

The success of the Indian National Congress movement.

16. The Gujarát Gazette (76), in its issue of the 18th April, writes:—The success of the Indian National Congress movement is every day more and more pronounced. Viceroys and the Secretary of State for India have given way before the force of its arguments. Within five years from its birth it has secured two valuable rights for the children of the soil. The right to discuss the Indian budget and to interpellate the executive, though granted under strong safeguards, are beneficial alike to the people and the Government. The same movement working in England has borne equally valuable fruits.

The Indian National Congress and the rights it has secured.

17. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 10th April, writes:—Sir Syed Ahmed, the Anglo-Indian press, and other opponents of the Indian National Congress will kindly remember that this movement has just scored two. It is no use whatever saying that the discussion of the Indian budget in the Viceregal Council and the right of interpellation are demands on which the entire community is agreed. It is tolerably certain that if it had not been for the Congress Lord Dufferin would not have written his memorandum, neither would anything have been done so early. Lord Dufferin said some hard things against some Congress-men and their writings, but he was then spurred as much by a sense of personal disappointment as by a public duty. But now that his intentions have become public, he deserves the most cordial recognition from the Congress and all leaders of public opinion in the country. It seems necessary also that Lord Dufferin's proposals, so far as they go, should be met with the most unreserved and hearty demonstrations of acceptance.

The Hyderabad (Sind) police and the Indian National Congress.

18. The Hyderabad correspondent of the same newspaper says that on the 3rd April he was interviewed by two police officers, independently of each other, for the purpose of getting information from him about everything connected with the Indian National Congress, gives the substance of the interview, and asks who is at the bottom—the Government of India, the Government of Bombay, or the Commissioner in Sind, or is it a mere freak on the part of an over-zealous Police Superintendent? Referring to this letter of its Hyderabad correspondent, the Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 13th April, writes:—From what our correspondent says there may be nothing sinister in the object of the police. It may be merely the curiosity of ignorance, or the result of over-zeal on the part of a Police Superintendent, as our correspondent suggests, or of somebody else. We should not like to believe, until thoroughly satisfied of it, that the executive authorities have any hand in the matter. Some time ago an attempt was made in the presidency proper by some local authorities to intimidate the Congress party whose number was increasing very rapidly. His Excellency Lord Reay's firmness extinguished the official zeal at once. His Lordship simply said that it was no business of anybody, the police or any other, to enquire who belonged or who did not belong to the Congress. There was no occasion then as now to make any fuss in Sind, because, so far as the Congress was concerned, there was nothing doing in this province. A few delegates were annually elected and sent to the Congress; a few tracts were occasionally circulated, but nothing further has yet been done. If it is now intended to intimidate the supporters of the Congress by making inquiries through the police, it may turn out a mistake, because there may be something to learn very soon if there may be nothing now. If it is mere curiosity we hope every attempt will be made to satisfy it, because the police are dreadfully ignorant. If they have any other object in view they will find very little work for themselves. But if they or the executive authorities wish it, attempts will be made to organise Sind for Congress purposes. Electorates will be duly established and public meetings will be held everywhere, so that the police will find their work cut out for them. In the meantime we may state for the information of the police and others interested in the Congresswállás of Sind that the proper quarter to apply to is the Secretary, Karáchi Committee, who will be happy to give them every information in his power.

19. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 14th April, writes:—The extremely low standard of comfort in India is considered by the Indian Finance Minister as a sufficient reason for not raising the minimum of taxable income, which is Rs. 500 a year. We do not know if the same reason is held to justify a tax on such a necessary of life and health, of men and cattle, as salt which was left untaxed even by the despotic Moslem rulers of the country. But leaving such a question aside, there are other considerations which go to support the demand made before the Supreme Legislative Council the other day for raising the limit to Rs. 1,000. Administratively it will remove much of the scope for oppressive assessment or levy of the tax, as the classes liable under the present limit are the least able to seek or obtain redress. Then, the apparently low scale of living is amply compensated for by the religious and ceremonious observances and, still more, marriages during which people have to incur expenditure that in many cases proves crushing. We are, it need not be said, no upholders of injurious practices of any sort, but considering the admitted extent of ignorance and want of education among the masses and the influence of custom from which even enlightened lands are not quite free, we submit that their economic bearings on the tax-payer's condition ought not to be ignored by a wise Government in framing its fiscal measures. Besides, we are tempted to ask again, why is not the income-tax levied in this country on the simple principle as in England, that is, after deducting the income required for the necessaries of life?

The ábkári policy of the Indian Government.

20. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 14th April, writes:—In reply to the criticism against their ábkári policy, the Government from the Secretary of State for India down to the provincial Governors and Commissioners always reply that the diminution of consumption is their primary object and that revenue is only a secondary consideration. To this His Excellency the Viceroy added in the Supreme Legislative Council the other day that it was impossible to lay down one uniform system for all India. The last-named difficulty will be admitted generally, as also the soundness of the policy as laid down in theory. But before the popular mind comes to believe that it is that theory, and not some other, that is carried out practically by the A´bkári Department, three things must be plain to it. In the first place, it must feel satisfied that the Government, in their annual review of the report of the working of the department, exhibit a jealous scrutiny into the causes which tend to increase revenue, and see that increase is due solely to prevention of illicit manufacture or trade in liquor and not the pushing energy of the vendor and the readings of the officials to help him to open up virgin soils for his enterprise. At present, we believe, not only is this not always done, but the increase of revenue is welcomed without any special reference to its true cause, and the credit thereby given to the department encourages its officials to further activity, and thus demoralises them and the public generally. Secondly—and this and the next observation we make only with reference to our own presidency—that feature of the administrative system which makes it the evident self-interest of the contractor to push on the sale of his article must be abandoned. The existing arrangement is ingenious; it almost makes the machine a self-working one and achieve the best it can in its own line. But that is just what is not desirable, and if a change involves loss of revenue while it withdraws the stimulus to extension of the traffic, it cannot be deferred on that ground, for it conflicts with the declaration that revenue is a secondary consideration with the Government. A considerable modification of this arrangement is, therefore, essential. The third requisite is that unfermented toddy, which undeniably is a healthy drink, should be rendered as accessible to the consumers as it was before the harsh legislation of 1878,—a legislation of which the A'bkári Commissioner was allowed to dictate several provisions to the local Legislative Council in the Council Room itself! That was during a régime which mistook strong measures for high statesmanship, and ábkári and forest laws and rules ran riot, and lands which were under private cultivation or which even did not exist were declared in the official Gazette as reserved or protected forests, and taxes on toddy were doubled and trebled. This high pressure could not exist without causing discontent, and something has been done during these few years to afford relief. But it is not enough; the public mind cannot, as regards the ábkári policy, be at ease until it is modified in the directions indicated above.

The gift to Abdul Gaffur, head butler of Sir James Fergusson, late Governor of Bombay.

21. The Pratod (51), in its issue of the 15th April, writes:—What authority had Sir James Fergusson to give away public land to his head butler? But who dare ask these high officials about their doings? The Government resolution that what is done is done and the land cannot be taken back and the gift revoked is extremely shameful and silly. If the butler's services had been so eminent that they must be rewarded, the Governor should have done so from his own private purse. A good many Anglo-Indian officials consider India to be their private estate. The House of Commons ought to institute inquiries into this disgraceful affair.

22. The Sudhárak (17), in its issue of the 15th April, writes:—Every one admits that His Excellency Lord Reay has deserved exceedingly well of us. Happily his manly and upright conduct in the Crawford case has received the approbation of the Secretary of State for India, and thus the unfortunate contingency that might have arisen of his resigning his post before the expiry of his term of office is now averted. But this tenure of office ends in April next. Surely we ought not to part with a Governor, who has done and suffered so much for purifying the administration and watching and promoting in other ways the interests of the people, without at least a strong and earnest and a unanimous expression of opinion on our part that we should indeed be happy and grateful if Her Majesty's Government extended the period of His Lordship's office and enabled us to continue for a long time in the enjoyment of his fostering care. It is not often that we get a Governor of His Lordship's mental calibre or his scrupulous sense of duty. If our prayer is granted, of course nothing will make us happier. But even if it is not, we shall have expressed, in a fitting manner, our very high sense of the magnificent services which His Excellency has rendered to this presidency.

His Excellency Lord Reay's administration of the Bombay Presidency praised.

23. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 14th April, writes:—We take the liberty of observing that His Excellency Lord Reay can look back with pride upon his administration of this presidency, especially because as an educationist of rare abilities he is leaving behind him an indelible mark upon the educational history of Bombay. His immediate predecessor in office was known as the educational Governor, but Lord Reay will be remembered as our educational benefactor.

Praise of His Excellency Lord Reay in connection with the Victoria Jubilee Technical Institute, Bombay.

24. Referring to the formal opening ceremony of the Victoria Jubilee Technical Institute, Bombay, the Sudhárak (17), in its issue of the 15th April, writes:—His Excellency Lord Reay has done what a far-seeing, benevolent, conscientious and exceptionally able Governor and statesman can do amidst a host of almost insuperable difficulties of every description—want of money, popular prejudices, interested opposition, malicious misrepresentations, and many more. But he has successfully braved them all, and with the co-operation of a liberal Pársi gentleman and some other good men has succeeded in bringing into existence an institution that is destined to confer substantial benefits on the people of the country, and to secure in their hearts an ever-increasing gratitude and admiration for his benign wisdom and broad humanity. [The Gujarát Darpan (75), in its issue of the 14th April, refers to the same ceremony, and remarks that His Excellency Lord Reay could not have raised for himself a better monument.]

25. The Rást Goftár (82), in its issue of the 14th April, writes:—The address of His Excellency the Governor to the Bombay Chamber of Commerce is a comprehensive review of his administration. Though it is a plain, unvarnished story of the changes and progress made during his régime, it affords a convincing proof that His Excellency has acquitted himself of his high office with credit to himself and advantage to the State. The policy of retrenchment necessitated by the ever-increasing expenditure on imperial objects is being steadily carried out, and the re-organization made in various departments in pursuance of that policy has tended to secure greater efficiency with economy. We hope that the example set by Lord Reay of going in person to address an important public body like the Chamber on questions of finance, commerce and general administration will be followed by his successors. As the Honourable Forbes Adam has said, a personal interchange of views between the head of the Government and the Chamber, or such other responsible public body, would solve many difficulties, clear up many misunderstandings, and save much of the time wasted in the cumbrous and roundabout process involved in red-tapeism. His Excellency spoke in very flattering terms of the merits and attainments of the President of the Chamber, and the sentiments expressed by the Governor were emphatically shared by the Chamber as they would no doubt be shared with no less heartiness by the general public. Mr. Forbes Adam enjoys the esteem and confidence of Europeans and Natives alike, and he is fully entitled to the high place which he holds in the estimation of the public, the Chamber and the Government.

His Excellency Lord Reay's visit to Surat after the recent fires there and praise of His Excellency.

26. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 14th April, writes:—By far the most notable incident connected with the Surat fire was His Excellency the Governor's visit to Surat. It has had a very soothing influence on the popular mind. An esteemed correspondent, an eye-witness, writes to say that as the populace saw the embodiment of mábáp sarkár moving in their midst in flesh and blood—inquiring, comforting, reproving, showing by every act how much he felt for the sufferers—some of these latter lifted up their hands in mute gratitude for this living sympathy vouchsafed. 'The very sight of a great Hákam,' writes our friend, 'walking about for three or four hours, not as a Nawáb, but as a simple gentleman, inspired us with hope; and even some of those ignorant poor who had been huddled together like despairing sheep driven out of their shed began in the sweet excitement caused by Lord Reay's visit to look up and about. Following him from street to street they forgot their own ruin in admiring his father-like solicitude.' We believe this visit to Surat was a stroke of inspiration, considering the time and the circumstances, and it has had at least as re-assuring an effect on the panic-stricken masses as the subscriptions started and the sympathy expressed by the public generally. Visits like this to Surat and the one to Ahmednagar during the recent scarcity there stamp Lord Reay as a citizen-ruler par excellence apart from his actual work as head of the administration, in which we see heart and intelligence are often traced in the career of Indian proconsuls. Lord Reay's visits of sympathy serve another useful purpose besides that of allaying popular uneasiness—they enable the administration to do its best for outlying districts, and to do it with a correct knowledge of their wants and requirements. Both these results tend directly to the popularity of British rule in India. In this light it is not difficult to see why an appeal had been going up, now and again during the past year, for an extension of Lord Reay's term of office. Nor is it difficult to see how heartily this appeal is preferred by the educated as well as the illiterate classes. Knowing what we do of the exigencies of party politics in England, we can only state the fact in this place. [Several other papers also praise His Excellency Lord Reay for his visit to Surat soon after the recent calamitous fire in that town.]

Necessity for the Bombay Government helping the sufferers by the recent disastrous fire in Surat.

27. The Gujaráti (77), in its issue of the 14th April, writes:—His Excellency Lord Reay has generously contributed from his own pocket a large sum towards the Surat fire relief fund, and everybody is grateful to him for his practical manifestation of sympathy. The question, however, still remains as to how the Bombay Government means to discharge its own obligations. If it be the moral duty of each and every person and association to do something in aid of the distressed, can it be maintained that our enlightened Government is alone exempted from the obligations resting on it? We feel perfectly sure that if this calamity had occurred in a Native State—which God forbid—the conduct of that State would have been far otherwise. Lord Reay is personally a man of large-hearted and catholic sympathies; but the fact that even with such a ruler at the head of Government the latter refuses to respond is painfully suggestive of a striking contrast between a native and a foreign government. We have noticed this incident, because it is the subject of general comment throughout the community. We admit that rulers in Native States and the Bombay Government are not similarly situated, but even making a large allowance for this circumstance, that genuine and innate sympathy which was so gratefully exhibited by His Highness the Mahárája of Bhávnagar quite recently in connection with the ceremony of opening the taps for meeting the impending scarcity of water in his State is painfully absent in all the doings and sayings of our alien Government. [The Gujarát Darpan (75), in its issue of the 14th April, observes that on the occasion of the last disastrous fire in Surat in 1837 the Government contributed the large sum of Rs. 50,000 for the relief of the sufferers and in addition allowed them to make use of Government timber free of charge for re-building houses, and that the people are very anxious to know what aid the Government are going to give this time to the sufferers from the recent calamitous fire in that town. The Yajdán Parast (141), in its issue of the 14th April, says that the public wish that Government should declare what aid they are going to give as regards re-building of houses, the reduction in taxation and the employment of the sufferers by the recent fire. The Gujarát Gazette (76), in its issue of the 18th April, says that Government should remit the income and other taxes in Surat for about two years, and that they should give pecuniary help to the sufferers by advancing money to them at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum with a view to enable them to rebuild houses and shops.]

The absence at Surat at the time of the recent fires of the Collector and his Assistant and of the Police Superintendent disapproved and His Excellency Lord Reay requested to make inquiries.

28. A correspondent of the Gujaráti (77), in its issue of the 14th April, writes:—I must say that the Collector's absence at the time of the recent fires in Surat was keenly felt and bitterly regretted on all sides. I know that the heavy responsibilities of the Collector must take him away from his head-quarters, but an arrangement according to which neither he nor his Assistant can be at the head-quarters at such an important and critical moment is to be deprecated and must be altered. Better arrangements can be made, especially at a moment when the Collector is not within a day or two's journey from his head-quarters. If the local police force is inadequate for the present crisis it is advisable that Government should send to Surat a company of Bombay soldiers and a detachment of Bombay detectives under their renowned head, Khán Bahádur Mir Abdul Alli. Business even now is at a standstill. To reinstate confidence in the people the Government of Lord Reay must institute a thorough inquiry into the whole matter. In the name of mercy and justice to the thousands that have been made homeless and in the cause of public safety I must earnestly beseech the press and the public to insist upon an inquiry and—let me repeat once more—to see that such an incident as the absence of the Collector, the Assistant Collector and the Superintendent of Police is never repeated.

Separation of Sind from the Bombay Presidency.

29. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 10th April, writes:—Naturally enough public opinion in the Panjáb is resenting Lord Reay's somewhat broad hint at Sukkur that the question of annexing Sind with the Panjáb was once more very likely to be shelved. His Excellency is taxed with having made a political speech at a place where it was not at all wanted. We unhesitatingly deny this. Whether the remarks were palatable or otherwise may be a matter for argument, but as to the appropriateness of the occasion there can be no doubt whatsoever. The Lansdowne Bridge forms an additional link between the Panjáb and Sind, and it would be natural to inquire on such an occasion whether the expectation of having the provinces amalgamated would be realized. Anyway it must be a great relief to Sind to know that things will continue as they are. Between Bombay and Lahore we had grown almost distracted and the suspense was becoming almost unendurable. His Excellency Lord Reay has laid us under great obligation by affording us this much-needed relief.

Approval of the rumoured appointment of Mr. James, Collector of Ahmedabad, as Commissioner in Sind.

30. The Gujarát Gazette (76), in its issue of the 18th April, writes:—We hear that our popular Collector, Mr. James, is going to Sind to succeed Mr. Pritchard as Commissioner there, who succeeds Mr. Richey in the gubernatorial Council, Mr. Richey going on leave. Ahmedabad can hardly, even though temporarily, lose Mr. James's services just now, but as he is going to a better and more lucrative place we cannot but heartily congratulate him and wish the rumour is correct.

Mr. Fitzpatrick's appointment as Resident at Hyderabad approved.

31. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 10th April, writes:—The Hyderabad Residentship, which has been the subject of much anxious consideration to the Government of India, goes to Mr. D. Fitzpatrick, C.S.I., Chief Commissioner of Assam. A better selection could have been scarcely made. During his administration of a province which has often proved trying to the best-intentioned administrators, because of the abuses which often go unredressed, Mr. Fitzpatrick made himself universally respected by his firmness, kindness and his ever-watchful anxiety for the interests of the subject population. What may be a gain to Hyderabad will be a sore loss to Assam and it will not be easy to find a suitable successor to Mr. Fitzpatrick.

The dilatoriness of the Bombay Small Cause Court.

32. The Subodh Patrika (16), in its issue of the 14th April, writes:—The Bombay Small Cause Court is resorted to by hundreds upon hundreds of poor and ignorant suitors and the fees realised annually leave one lákh of rupees to the credit of Government. The suitors, therefore, have a right to a speedy and, as far as practicable, unerring justice being administered to them, which can only be done by Judges who are fully conversant with the language and the ways of life and condition of the majority of the suitors, quick in apprehension and correct in the appreciation of evidence and decision. We believe the Court has not a plethora of such men on the bench and the recent appointments to it do not seem quite calculated to remove the defect so far as it existed.

Remarks on the sentence passed on Sadánand Yesoba, late cashier in the Bombay Small Cause Court.

33. The Vártáhar (19), in its issue of the 14th April, writes:—We are very sorry for Sadánand Yesoba, late cashier and accountant of the Bombay Small Cause Court. There are various rumours as to the sudden disappearance of the cash in his control from the safe. Taking into consideration the long service and the old age of the offender we think the sentence of 6 years' rigorous imprisonment passed on him is rather severe. We therefore request our citizens to hold a public meeting to adopt a memorial to Government, pointing out therein the extenuating circumstances which exist in his case and the justice of mitigating the sentence. [The Yajdán Parast (141) of the 14th April also thinks the sentence passed on Sadánand Yesoba to be severe. The Káside Mumbai (112) of the 15th April says that though the sentence is severe, it is exemplary.]

The case of Sadánand Yesoba, late cashier, Bombay Small Cause Court, and disclosures made therein.

34. The Gujaráti (77), in its issue of the 14th April, says that Mr. Hart's defence of the late Mr. Spencer, Second Judge, Bombay Small Cause Court, in the matter of the latter taking Government money from Sadánand Yesoba, convicted of misappropriating Government money at the last criminal sessions, is lame. It disapproves of some high Government officers using Government money for their private purposes, expresses surprise at the late Mr. Spencer, his son and his nephew being employed in the Bombay Small Cause Court in contravention of the Government orders prohibiting the employment of relatives in the same department, and adds that though Sadánand, late cashier of the Court, has practised dishonesty, it is no defence of some of the officers of the Small Cause Court.

Lists of special and common jurors for the town of Bombay recently published criticized.

35. The Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 16th April, says that the lists of common and special jurors for the city of Bombay recently published are unnecessarily long as scarcely half of the jurors will ever be called in any single year to sit upon a jury, that there are several names in the list of common jurors that ought to go in that of special jurors, and that some of the jurors have so little knowledge of English as to scarcely understand the proceedings, and recommends that the number of special jurors may be limited to 175 and that of common jurors to 500, appointing a committee of the heads of different communities to revise the lists.

36. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 13th April, writes:—May we suggest to the present City Magistrate the propriety of punctuality, which is the essence of politeness, not in kings only but in all men? General dissatisfaction appears to be felt by the want of punctuality displayed by the present Magistrate. Cases are fixed for hearing at 11 or 12 o'clock and the Magistrate does not sometimes appear on the bench till 3 o'clock. Irregularity like this may not be noticed in a mofussil Court, or even a Cantonment Magistrate's, but in a Police Court it is not to be thought of. There are pleaders who have other engagements during the day elsewhere, parties who are kept needlessly waiting, and above all the public, which expects the City Magistrate's Court to be always a model court in the city. We trust the present Magistrate is conscious of the difficulty of his position in having succeeded an admirable officer like Mr. Steele. He was invariably punctual and always on the bench between 11 and 12 o'clock. That is an example which ought to be followed. The present Magistrate has an excellent temper, but we are afraid he does not succeed in maintaining order in the Court. The most patient and equal-tempered Magistrate must insist upon order being maintained in his Court and on maintaining his dignity. We can fully sympathise with the difficulties of the Magistrate, but he should cope with them without any delay.

Inconvenience suffered by witnesses, petitioners and others having business in the Court of the District Judge, Khándesh, and a request in the matter.

37. The Khándesh Chitraguptă (39), in its issue of the 16th April, calls the attention of the District Judge, Khándesh, to the inconvenience which suitors, witnesses, petitioners and others suffer owing to there being no shed or no shady place for them to sit or stand when they attend the Subordinate Judges' Courts on business. This inconvenience is of long standing, says the paper, and should be immediately removed.

The Sátára Mámlatdár's Court.

38. The Pratod (51), in its issue of the 15th April, brings to the notice of the Collector of Sátára the wretched condition of the house in which the Mámlatdár's Kacheri is held, complains of the serious inconvenience to which suitors, petitioners and all those who have to attend the Court on business suffer owing to want of water, and hopes that the attention of the Collector will soon be drawn to this state of things. The paper blames the Mámlatdár for not himself moving in the matter, and observes that lákhs of rupees are spent in the Public Works Department and that the considerations of retrenchment do not occur to the authorities there, while public courts like the Mámlatdár's suffer because the order of the day is that expenditure should be reduced.

A request to His Excellency Lord Reay to institute an enquiry into the grievances of clerks and the inferior servants in Government and quasi-Government establishments.

39. The Vártáhar (19), in its issue of the 14th April, writes :—We had already a Factory Commission for the protection of the mill hands, one for ábkári for checking drinking, one for forests for alleviating the distress of the rayats, one for finding out the cause of the agrarian riots of 1875, two others for education and the public service—all well-meant and properly directed, no doubt, but who has heard of the grievances of the poor clerks and the inferior servants employed in Government and quasi-Government establishments? It therefore behoves His Excellency Lord Reay to signalise the last year of his administration by appointing a commission of independent men for investigating the truth of this matter. There is a widespread feeling of discontent prevailing all round, and it is but meet that the voice of this class, so long stifled, should now be heard. The first item is ill-treatment and the hurling of foul abuse on the heads of the unfortunates. Courtesy and politeness are things unknown in these days of official tyranny, while the privileges laid down in the Civil Leave Code are reserved for the highly-paid or those of one's own belonging. In fact, their condition has become wretched to a degree. Hence it is that the position of this hard-worked class needs immediate improvement. The serfdom they labour under must be forthwith removed. As there are rules for suspension and dismissal, so likewise there should be for the daily conduct of the heads of offices towards their subordinates in a right gentlemanly way, so that their general status may be maintained and their position may become one of respectability. It is of no use to call a few at the dining table and shake them by the hand, but some substantial improvement should be made in their condition. We hope His Lordship, with his usual acuteness and philanthropic zeal, will prove himself what the plain John Howard and Lord Shaftesbury proved to prisoners and the work-people of the factories all over the civilized world. A few simple rules workable in their nature and of general applicability are all that are required to infuse a proper sense of duty in the minds of the employer and the employed. When we have legislation or enquiry on paltry matters, it stands to reason that the happiness of one's servants must be a subject of paramount importance and concern, chiefly to the head of the administration.

Bombay ought to have a first class Lunatic Asylum.

40. The Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 15th April, says :—The administration report on the Lunatic Asylums of the Bombay Presidency for the year 1888 once more reminds us of the urgent necessity for having a first class Asylum at Bombay. There are more lunatics in the town than can be admitted in the Colába Asylum. They are deprived of the chance of recovery by means of scientific treatment. There being no private Asylum, even well-to-do lunatics whose guardians are willing to pay for their treatment are denied the benefits of professional treatment. Bombay ought to have a first class institution that would amply meet the necessities of the case.

A complaint about the vernacular press not being furnished with a copy of the State Secretary's decision in the Crawford case when the same was supplied to the Bombay English dailies.

41. The Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 19th April, says :—It is much to be regretted that the Bombay Government, while expeditiously furnishing the local English dailies with a copy of the Secretary of State's decision in the Crawford case, should have forgotten to extend the same favour to the vernacular newspapers. When there is some particular purpose to serve Government do not hesitate to take the vernacular press into their confidence, but at other times their memory proves defective. The Native public is likely to infer that because the Government were attacked by the English press in connection with the Crawford case, great care was taken to expeditiously communicate the decision to it. It is to be hoped that such sort of invidious distinction will not be made in future between the Anglo-Indian and the Vernacular press. [The Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 18th April, makes a similar complaint.]

Disapproval of the order issued by the Collector of Ahmedabad in the matter of the collection of levies for the Vaishnav Maháráj and the fund for sick animals.

42. The Praja Mat (124) of the 13th April disapproves of the order issued by Mr. James, Collector of Ahmedabad, prohibiting the collection of levies for the benefit of the Vaishnav Maháráj and of the fund for the lame and sick animals in that town in the vicinity of the municipal office and other places where the municipality levies its duties, does not understand what right the Collector has to stop this privilege enjoyed by the above-named two parties from olden times, and says that this arbitrary order ought to be withdrawn as neither the Collector, the Divisional Commissioner nor the Government even have power to deprive any person of his right in the interests of the general public, and that the municipality will have unduly to bear the cost of litigation as the parties concerned are sure not to submit quietly to the order. [The Ahmedabad Times (85), in its issue of the 9th April, takes a similar view.]

Insufficiency of water in Rájkot.

43. The Káthiáwár Times (81), in its issue of the 14th April, writes:— The alarming fire at Surat leads one to think that if a fire were unfortunately to break out in Rájkot the whole town would be gutted and thousands of lives destroyed. There is no drinking water in the station. For the last six years plans and estimates, revised and re-revised, are being submitted, special officers deputed, special reports furnished, and yet nothing is being done. Mr. Doig has not, we hear, yet submitted his report. His Excellency the Governor will be pleased to call for the report and order the water scheme to be carried out as early as possible. The station Magistrate does his best to supply the want, but what can he do? Wells are sunk deeper and deeper, but as there is no moisture in the ground there is no sign of water. The want is now being very keenly felt. Will not the Political Agent urge on the Government the immediate expediency of constructing water-works? The water scheme deserves better attention than has been accorded it in past years. If anything untoward occurs, who shall be held responsible?

A dispensary wanted in Mátar, Kaira District.

44. In a news-letter from Mátar, the Praja Mat (124), in its issue of the 13th April, says that the people in that town suffer great inconvenience owing to the want of a dispensary and that it is greatly needed, and hopes that Government will supply the want.

Suggestions for reforming the Indian police.

45. The Din Mani (73), in its issue of the 16th April, suggests that in order to have educated men in the police force a school should be opened in every head-quarters of the force, that the sons of policemen should be taught in it, and that illiterate policemen should be made to attend it after finishing their duties. It remarks that Government should prevent policemen from taking bribes from cartmen when impressing them into service, complains of some European police officers making some policemen do their own private work, and observes that the Indian police should be well armed and drilled in order that they may prove useful in protecting the people in times of exigencies.

The nuisance caused by the residence of European prostitutes in the Fort and other respectable quarters in Bombay.

46. In noticing the petition recently submitted to Government by the European and Native traders and merchants of the English Bazar, Fort, Bombay, complaining of unbearable nuisance being caused by European women of loose character who have opened shops in that quarter as ice-cream vendors and praying for riddance of the evil, the Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 20th April, says :—The serious inconvenience suffered by the petitioners ought to induce Government to take immediate steps to drive the prostitutes back to the Kharsetji Sukláji Street, where they resided until the police committed the blunder of compelling them to remove from it. The evil is not confined to the Fort alone; several quarters of the town, such as the main Kálbádevi Road, suffer from it, causing great inconvenience to the residents of those quarters and to the public in general. It is therefore to be hoped that this nuisance will be removed from all respectable quarters in the town. [The Jáme Jamshed (108) and the Akhbáre Sodágar (87) of the same date express similar sentiments.]

Mischief committed by a gang of Kábuli vagrants in the Surat District.

47. A correspondent of the Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 20th April, says :—For some days past a gang of Kábuli vagrants has been visiting different villages, stealing articles from the houses or plundering travellers who happen to come across it. Some sweat-meat sellers of Bulsár were, it is said, going to the Unái fair to open shops, but were plundered of their goods by this gang and had to return home.

Remarks on the conduct of police patels and the district police.

48. In noticing the strong remarks made by Mr. Hirálál Keshavlál, First Class Magistrate of Thána, who tried the Bandora assault case in which eight villagers were arraigned for committing assault on Mr. Chalk, Mrs. Chalk and their servants, condemning the conduct of the police patel and the police in connection with the case, the Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 18th April, says :—Either on account of insufficient strength or through carelessness, or with some particular object, police patels and the police do not discharge their duties properly in regard to crimes occurring in villages. Railway convenience has made visits to rural districts easier than before, but very few of the visitors who are cheated or otherwise injured by villagers receive due help from the police patel or the police. [The Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 19th April, recommends the improvement of the district police and of the condition of the police patels.]

A complaint against the police in the village of Ora, táluka Vágra, district Broach.

49. The Broach Mitră (92), in its issue of the 10th April, says that in the village of Ora, táluka Vágra, district Broach, stones were continually thrown at the house of one Rájárám Sivlál from the 25th March to the 3rd April 1889, that no heed has been paid to his petitions in the matter, that the girásiás mentioned in the petitions continue to harm him, that these men and the police patel tell the labourers called from the village of Uber not to do his work, and that it is surprising that the police should have paid no attention to his complaint.

PART II.—Legislation.

Dr. Hewlett's letter criticizing the Bombay Village Sanitation Bill approved.

50. The Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 19th April, expresses approval of Dr. Hewlett's letter to the Times of India dated the 29th ultimo criticizing the Bombay Village Sanitation Bill, but regrets the tone of that letter, expressing, however, a hope that due changes will be made in the Bill in accordance with Dr. Hewlett's recommendations, which coincide with the views already expressed by it.

PART III.—Education.

Complaint regarding the expenditure and management of the Rájkumár College, Rájkot.

51. The Rájyabhakt (126), in its issue of the 16th April, says that the expenditure of half a lákh of rupees per annum on the Rájkumár College, Rájkot, is very large when regard is had to its condition and the number of students in it, which is only 30. The number of students, observes the paper, is falling off, and hence retrenchment will have to be made in its expenditure, as the fund set apart to meet it is decreasing day after day. When Prince Muluvála, son of Suragvála, a part-proprietor of Jetpur, left the College in November last, his father had to contribute Rs. 6,000 to the fund in question at the advice, say pressure, of the authorities concerned. It cannot be believed that the contribution was voluntary, as the donor is known to be frugal. The expenditure ought to be reduced in proportion to the number of students. It seems that the tálukdárs, who are conversant with the state of the College, do not like to send their sons to it. The late Colonel Watson had in December last to re-entrust Bhimávála, a part-proprietor of Mendarda, with powers in order to induce him to send his son to the College. When such inducements have to be offered, the mismanagement in the College cannot but be great. If the Principal of the College had been a Native, it is not necessary to say how he would have been dealt with. The students in the first class have no more knowledge than that possessed by those in the 4th standard of a well-conducted high school and do not know any second language. It is necessary that the authorities should state how the students pass their time. The late Colonel Watson also once expressed his unfavourable opinion about the College while he was in Bombay.

Part IV.—Railways.

52. "A traveller" writes to the Káthiáwár Times (81) of the 17th April to complain of the hardship suffered by passengers, of the rude conduct of some of the railway employés, and of the mismanagement prevailing on the Junágad-Verával railway line. He complains of over-crowding of third-class passengers in 3rd, 2nd, and 1st class carriages and of their being carried in open waggons on the occasion of the recent Chaitri Punam fairs in Junágad and Prabháspátan and the Thákorji's wedding in Mádhavpur. On the 11th instant several passengers were left behind at intermediate stations for want of room in the carriages and had to wait at the stations till the next day. On the 13th instant there was a large number of passengers waiting at the Verával station to proceed to Junágad, and Mr. Macpherson, an audit officer of the railway, had them closely packed in the carriages, some of them being made to sit in the urinals in the 1st and 2nd class carriages. Four open waggons were also attached to the train and passengers were carried in them. Additional passengers were thrust in the carriages at the intermediate stations, but several were left behind at each station. Some of the female passengers were left behind, while their male relatives were thrust in the carriages. Some of the female passengers from Verával to Junágad were forced to get down at the Máliya station and their wailings excited much pity. The rule about carrying male and female passengers in separate carriages was not strictly observed on the day. When three additional passenger trains were run between Junágad and Jetalsar on the 11th instant, why was not the same thing, asks the correspondent, done between Junágad and Verával?

Part V.—Municipalities.

The new Standing Committee of the Bombay Municipal Corporation.

53. The Subodh Patrika (16), in its issue of the 14th April, writes:—All nominations hitherto made by the Government of His Excellency Lord Reay have been so judicious that it is with much reluctance that we notice one or two recent instances of what seems to us an exception to the rule. The first relates to the appointment of members of the Standing Committee of the Bombay Municipal Corporation. The Corporation elected only one Hindu, and as he was a Gujaráti it was expected that Government would nominate a Marátha. But they also added another Gujaráti, and he by no means a man of any public mark. Some of the members of the Standing Committee, to make up for this short representation of the Hindu element in the ruling body of the municipality, very properly proposed to appoint Mr. Javerilál Umiáshankar as chairman of that body, but the majority voted for Mr. Dosábhái Frámji, who had already been chairman for three times, on the ground that this was the first time when the Committee was empowered to appoint its chairman and that therefore Mr. Dosábhái would now occupy that position only for the first time! We think the Committee would have better proved its fitness for the exercise of power by agreeing to the nomination of Mr. Javerilál. The argument much made of in favour of Mr. Dosábhái was that the Pársis have done much for Bombay. We should be the last to deny them the credit which is their due, but surely that is no reason why they, who form only one of the rate-paying communities of the city, should overcrowd its municipal councils and offices to the comparative exclusion of the rest. Such exclusiveness in the civil administration of a composite city does not indicate in it much genuine progress of the spirit or fitness for local self-government. If the Pársis have been wealthy and public-spirited in the disposal of their wealth, their proper reward lies in a due recognition of their merits in their own proper lines, and we humbly think that it is a confusion of ideas to use that argument in order to support such an arrangement as that under notice and to back up civil inequalities. We can assure our Pársi brethren that we are not guided by any class bias or jealousy in making these remarks, and indeed we are glad to find that our argument in substance was advanced by one of their own class, Mr. K. M. Shroff, before the Standing Committee itself. [The Yajdán Parast (141), in its issue of the 14th April, disapproves of the appointment by Government of Messrs. Mulji Bhavánidás Bárbháya and Fázalbhái Vishrám as their nominees on the Standing Committee of the Bombay Municipal Corporation, and says that the Committee has done well in electing Mr. Dosábhái Frámji as its chairman. A few other Gujaráti papers also approve of Mr. Dosábhái Frámji's election as chairman of the Standing Committee.]

The Surat Municipality and the recent fires.

54. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 14th April, writes:—The recent fire may prove the funeral of the Surat Municipality. It is impossible to think kindly of that discredited institution. By its niggardliness and want of responsible effort it has exposed the city to the ravages of disease, of crime, and of calamities. Probably half of what the fire has cost would have given Surat a splendid water-supply and a fire-brigade too. But the commissioners have turned a deaf ear to proposals of expenditure. They want the maximum of modern comforts for the minimum of primitive outlay. And we see what they get for their philosophy—fires, floods and epidemics. It remains to be seen if they will profit by this lesson. We have had letters and personal interviews, explaining how far the Surat Municipality has been to blame, not only for the absence of provision or want of effort while the fire was raging, but even for race jealousy in extinguishing it. The local police and some of the officials are said to have worked creditably with the limited resources at their disposal. Special thanks are due to Baroda for the rescue offered, with the generous donation of Rs. 5,000 by His Highness the Mahárája. Bombay has again acquitted herself well. We expected a larger collection than Rs. 28,000 on Wednesday, but the figure will doubtless go up, and supplemented by other contributions, private and public, it ought to suffice for immediate wants. We should be glad of a provision for those respectable traders who have lost their all, in order to enable them to start afresh. Such aid might be offered even on business principles. In the hurry and scramble of the hour we find Mahomedan co-operation unavailed of by the relief committee appointed on Wednesday. This oversight may now be remedied. A large number of Borahs and other Musalmans have suffered by the fire and it is necessary that their representatives should be nominated members of the relief committee. It is also to be hoped that the relief will be distributed honestly and impartially. The committee cannot trust every agent who offers himself.

55. The Pársi Punch (122), in its issue of the 14th April, contains a cartoon representing Mr. Punch as a Gujaráti school-master whipping some of the municipal commissioners of Surat. The letter-press runs thus:—A very sound castigation. Punch mehtáji lays on his whip rather heavily on the boys of the Surat municipal school for their gross negligence in not attending to their work and for wasting their time, brain and breath in mere squabbles. Punch mehtáji is convinced that the late conflagration would not have proved so calamitous had these dullards and fighting bullies properly studied the "Wants of the City" and the "Advantages of a well-equipped Fire-Brigade." [The Yajdán Parast

(141) of the same date takes the Surat Municipality to task for its gross and culpable negligence, says that if a similar calamitous fire had occurred in any of the cities of Europe and the municipality thereof had failed in its duty, the municipal commissioners and their houses would scarcely have escaped the wrath and fury of the sufferers from it, and remarks that the Surat Municipality should in the first place improve the fire-brigade and should construct water-works. A correspondent of the Rást Goftár (82) of the 14th April also complains against the Surat Municipality and requests His Excellency Lord Reay to force it to construct water-works and to thereby earn for himself the blessings of the people. "A Bania" writes to the Gujarát Mitră (78) of the 14th April to suggest that the Surat Municipality should contribute a half share towards the cost of the fire-engines and pumps that may be subscribed for by the inhabitants for use in their respective quarters and that it should have in its hands their entire management.]

The Surat fires and the causes of some of them.

56. The Gujarát Darpan (75), in its issue of the 18th April, writes:—Unfortunate as Surat has been in being a city of floods and fires, it is still more so in possessing rascals who would cut their nose to spite their eyes. Incendiarism was assigned as one of the causes of the many small fires which succeeded the greatest one on Saturday, the 6th April. Suspicion pointed at the Káthiáwár immigrants as the men who did the fell work. The police authorities were prompt in directing them to leave the city. But after that they have been successful in dragging out two culprits who were not Káthiáwáris but inhabitants of Surat. Both of them, it is reported, have confessed to have committed this crime imputed to them. One of these is a tailor lad, who tried to set fire to his shop because his landlord increased the rent of his shop. The other one is a Bania, whose attempt was more successful, it having destroyed two or three houses. Incendiarism apart, nature displayed its wrath against the Surtis most direfully. There have been cases of spontaneous combustion in old cotton beds and hay-stacks. Though it is nearly a fortnight since the great fire the panic among the people is great, many of whom dare not sleep within their houses lest they be burnt down in their beds, and it is kept up by their superstitious fears being fed by the hysteric ravings of persons who pretend to be inspired by Máta Bhaváni, by itinerant Lál Bhats, who go about the streets and deceive the ignorant people into believing that they will have yet more dire calamities to pass through if they do not propitiate the deities and through them the Bráhmans. Unless such people be brought to book and punished, we fear they will keep up the present excited feelings of the populace. It is very necessary for restoring confidence among the people that excellent patrolling arrangements be made in the city and the fire-brigade establishment placed on an efficient footing, and some arrangement, even though temporary, be made for supplying water. The first is to be done by the police authorities and we understand that an addition of fifty men is to be made to the existing force. The last two are to be done by the municipality. In the last meeting it has appointed two committees to report on both these matters.

The Bombay Government requested to continue for one year more the grant-in-aid to the Párekh Dispensary at Surat, as prayed for by the local municipality.

57. The Gujarát Mitră (78), in its issue of the 14th April, supports the prayer of the Surat Municipality for continuing the Government grant-in-aid of Rs. 1,800 to the local Párekh Dispensary for at least one year more by way of solace to the people who have suffered from the recent fires there, says that no fee should be levied from the patients coming to the dispensary for one year more and that a saving of Rs. 200 per mensem can be effected after that period in its expenditure as suggested by the municipality, and makes an appeal to His Excellency Lord Reay in the matter.

Appointment of the Collector as president of the Surat Municipality.

58. The Gujarát Darpan (75), in its issue of the 18th April, writes:—We have always advocated with the best of intentions the advancement of the scheme of local self-government in the mofussil. We gladly supported the memorial recently addressed by the local political association to the Bombay Government for the increase of the elective element in the local corporation. We continually urged the Government to appoint a non-official president to the place vacated by Khán Bahádur Mir Gulám Bába Khán. But by a strange irony of fate Government has, in consequence of the mischief created by individual commissioners, taken quite the opposite step. The elective element which we wished should have been extended to two-thirds has been kept the same as it was first granted. And besides we have been divested of the right of a non-official president, and the Collector has been placed in that position of honour. We deeply deplore this retrograde step, but there is no help for it. We, however, hope that all our crying needs and requirements will receive the most immediate attention of the Collector-president. It is true that under his stern eyes we shall hear less of the scandal of empty talks, party-spirit, silly squabbles and legal technicalities, which have been the evil features of the municipal administration for months past. [The Kaiser-i-Hind (111), in its issue of the 14th April, observes that the contending municipal commissioners of Surat have been justly punished by Government depriving them of the right of electing their municipal president and nominating the Collector to that post. The Satyavakta (129), in its issue of the 19th April, remarks that some of the municipal commissioners of Surat are more to blame than Government in the matter of the appointment of the Collector as president of the municipality.]

The Collector-president and harmony in the Surat Municipal Corporation.

59. The Suryă Prakásh (84), in its issue of the 20th April, writes:—It is our most pleasing duty to congratulate the Surat people on the peculiar harmony and order that pervaded the proceedings of the first meeting of the local corporation, held on the 15th instant, presided over by our energetic Collector, Mr. Crawley-Boevey. We could not have expected half the work even in nearly half a dozen meetings under the chairmanship of a non-official president. Here we do not mean to be understood that we are no friend of the development of municipal government under a non-official president. We cannot for a moment hold that Surat lacks public men qualified for the task. Far from it. It is the feeling of self-aggrandisement and radical prejudices that often runs high in the transaction of public business that we deplore acutely. We should fail in our sacred duty if we do not, while congratulating the Surtis, give Mr. Crawley-Boevey his due for the success of the last meeting.

Cholera in Surat and the local municipality.

60. The Deshi Mitră (98), in its issue of the 18th April, says that cholera continues unabated in Surat and attributes its continuance to want of cleanliness, sale of stale and rotten articles of food in the bázárs, and the failure of the municipality to use disinfecting powder and burn dammer in the streets.

Corruption in the Poona municipal elections.

61. The Kesari (38), in its issue of the 16th April, writing about the Government resolution anent the recent municipal elections at Poona, says:—The ugly rumours about corruption must have been got up by some defeated aspirant for municipal honours or some one at his back, or some flattering back-biter must have audaciously retailed this piece of scandal seasoned with his best lies, probably to accomplish his own private ends. Corrupt practices in elections are not uncommon things. Even in England this evil had grown to such an extent that the Legislature had to be appealed to. In Poona it cannot be positively asserted that the voters are not susceptible to bad influences. They are after all human beings. Government ought to have published the facts connected with these disgusting rumours before it took the step of fulminating a resolution. If there is any truth in the rumours, then the evil cannot be stopped and rooted out simply by the agency of public opinion, for public opinion is not so advanced in India. The Legislature would have to take upon itself the task of nipping the evil in the bud.

A complaint against the Kárwár Municipality.

62. The Kárwár Samáchár (37), in its issue of the 11th April, complains that the work of the local municipality is not going on well, that the chairman and the head clerk are near relatives and that it is therefore not to be expected that the affairs of the town will be administered impartially, and calls the attention of the president to the impropriety of allowing the head clerk to remain in office under his cousin, the chairman.

A request to the chairman of the School Committee of the Karád Municipality.

63. The Chitragupta (26), in its issue of the 14th April, calls the attention of the chairman of the School Committee of the local municipality to the case of one Vithal Bhikáji Dándekar, a school-master now under suspension, who had the indiscretion of caning a little boy named Vishnu, son of the Assistant Executive Engineer of Khándesh, requests him to deal with the school-master leniently as the fault, if any, is very trivial, points out that if teachers were not to punish naughty boys there would be an end of improvement, and recommends the school-master to the mercy of the Assistant Executive Engineer at whose suggestion the poor man was suspended.

PART VI.—Native States.

Approval of the abolition of the transit duties in Native States.

64. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 14th April, writes:—One of the most important results of Lord Reay's administration of Bombay is the abolition of transit duties from the presidency, including the Native States. In theory as in practice the transit duties are a barbarous impost, hampering trade at every step and the cultivation of friendly relations between neighbours. But bad as the impost is in itself, it is apt also to be abused by those who have to levy it. At times we have found it a perfect curse in some of the States. It needed patience both in the Government and their political officers to restrain some of the Chiefs from their policy of fiscal suicide. As a measure of general relief the transit duties must go from all centres, except where, owing to local peculiarities, they may be retained without injustice to others.

Remarks on the continuous absence of His Highness the Gáikwád of Baroda from his State.

65. In alluding to the almost continuous absence of His Highness the Gáikwád from his State for some time past, the Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 16th April, says:—The subjects of the Baroda State are much dissatisfied at the continuous absence of His Highness Sayáji Ráo, as the same is injurious to their interests. A Native Prince holds supreme power in his State, and when he is absent from it he cannot dispose of revenue, judicial and other appeals submitted to him except by proxy. The Supreme Government is very particular about the travels of Native Princes, and the unrestrained rambles of Sayáji Ráo have given rise to different rumours, the most recent of which is that the prince has taken to constant travelling on account of an unpleasant difference of opinion between him and the paramount Government. Some remarks offensive to Sayáji Ráo made in a recent issue of the Pioneer have served to confirm the last rumour. Whatever the truth may be, it is not beneficial to the prince and his subjects that His Highness should continue to be absent from his State, and it is to be hoped that His Highness will be advised by the paramount Government to give up this injurious practice. If Sayáji Ráo does not act accordingly, he should make due arrangements for the proper administration of the State with the advice of the representatives of his subjects.

Approval of the proposal to keep the young Mahárája of Kolhápur permanently in his State.

66. The Dnyán Ságar (28), in its issue of the 15th April, writes:—The subjects of the Kolhápur State are very glad at the news that Government contemplate keeping the young Mahárája permanently in his State under the guardianship of a good European civilian officer. The Kolhápur State affords every facility for the education of His Highness, and besides this the climate of the place is such that the young Mahárája will be much benefited physically by being kept in Kolhápur. The time is also come when His Highness should be in his State and should be gradually introduced to the first rudiments of public business under the able tutorship of the Diwán. There is Professor Candy and his able staff in the College and there is no fear of the education of His Highness being neglected. His Highness' stay in the State will be of incalculable benefit to himself and to his subjects. We therefore request the Government to take the contemplated step immediately and thereby gladden the loyal hearts of the Kolhápur people.

A suggestion to raise the salary of Khán Bahádur Meherjibhái Kuvarji, Diwán of Kolhápur.

67. The Dnyán Ságar (28), in its issue of the 15th April, makes the suggestion that the salary of Khán Bahádur Meherjibhái Kuvarji be raised to Rs. 1,000 as that gentleman is carrying on the administration very ably. His predecessor in office, Ráo Bahádur Mádhavráo Barve, got Rs. 1,000, as also Ráo Bahádur Mahádev G. Ránade, and therefore, continues the paper, the present Diwán, whose duties have considerably increased and whose responsibilities are great, should receive the same salary. It hopes that Government will immediately take into their consideration this suggestion.

68. In a contributed article the Rájyabhakt (126) of the 16th April gives its own version of the conversation between His Excellency Lord Reay and His Highness the Jám of Navánagar at the recent private interview between them in Bombay, mentions the various topics about reforming the Navánagar State which it alleges were touched upon at the time, among them being one about Mr. Maganlál, the Diwán, being a favourite of the late Colonel Watson, the expenses of whose mistress, Miss Moyle, were, it is alleged, defrayed by Mr. Maganlál, while Bhávnagar gave money to her, and remarks that the Jám has failed in the object with which he had come to Bombay. It adds that Mr. Lely will very likely be appointed to Jámnagar, prefers the appointment of Mr. Jagannáth Ichchhárám of Surat as Kárbhári to that of Mr. Shankar Pándurang Pandit, whose names are, it says, talked about in connection with the post, and praises Lord Reay for freeing the people of Jámnagar from hardship. The same paper refers to His Excellency Lord Reay having invited His Highness the Thákor of Bhávnagar to meet him, and to his intention to get some information from the Thákor about Miss Moyle and the woman Kaisar and to reform the Bhávnagar State, and remarks that it is praiseworthy on the part of His Excellency to invite Native Rájás to meet him and to thereby learn of their abilities.]

A complaint against His Highness the Thákor of Bhávnagar.

69. The Rájyabhakt (126), in its issue of the 16th April, observes:—The evil practices of the Bhávnagar Darbár know no bounds. We learn that a mistress of the Thákor, who has borne a child to him, has been deprived of her estate of the value of Rs. 50,000 owing to her having not joined him in his improper conduct, that the estate has been presented to the woman Kaisar, that she has escaped to Ahmedabad owing to an attempt being made to poison her and her child, and that she will go to Mahábaleshvar and complain to His Excellency the Governor on the arrival of the Darbár there. May not this be a plot set up by interested men?

Alleged misappropriation of money by Mr. Motirám Bhaluji, Manager, Rájpur State, and a complaint against the Political Agency, Káthiáwár, in the matter.

70. In an article headed "Do not Government like to stop bribery in the Political Department?" the same newspaper writes:—How long will Government connive at mismanagement in the Political Department in Káthiáwár? Some of the officers in that department behave so badly that Government ought to lose no time in making an enquiry. We have received a strong complaint against a certain officer of the Political Department taking a bribe and shutting the door of justice. We pay no heed to it. The political officer against whom the complaint is made is honest and respectable. We do not suspect his honesty, but should not Government enquire into the complaint? The paper then refers to the petition made on the 30th March last by one Sha Vakhatchand Pánáchand to the Political Agent, Káthiáwár, complaining of misappropriation by Mr. Motirám Bhaluji, Manager of the petty State of Rájpur, of Rs. 148-8-0 due to him, and says:—If the complaint be true, Mr. Motirám, who has been appointed by Government to manage the State, can be charged with misappropriation and criminal breach of trust. Is it not the duty of Government to find out why the Assistant Political Agent did not enquire into the petition? The first petition was made to the Assistant Political Agent, Jhálávád, on the 12th November last, and by his order a sworn complaint was made on the 21st of the same month. It was now the duty of the Political Agent to issue a warrant for Mr. Motirám's arrest or to go on with the case. Will not Government enquire why the case has not been proceeded with? No reply has been given to the complainant though he made five petitions, the last being on the 30th March 1889. The case is clear. A Government officer is charged with misappropriation of money, but no enquiry is made. We have received petitions about numerous cases of oppression in the Wadhwán State, in which the connivance of the Political Department is also apparent. It is evident that in the case in question the Political Department is encouraging an evil deed instead of dispensing justice. We draw the attention of the Bombay Government to this important subject and request them to call for an explanation from the Political Agent.

The people and the Native States of Káthiáwár and a petition prepared by the editor and proprietor of the Rájyabhakt newspaper for presentation to His Excellency Lord Reay on their behalf.

71. The same newspaper gives a further instalment of the petition prepared by its editor and proprietor for presentation to His Excellency Lord Reay on behalf of the people and Native Princes of Káthiáwár, takes Junágad in hand, says that His Highness the Nawáb is given to drink and evil practices, that Government are aware of the intrigue about the heir to the throne, that the oppression practised by Sálehindi and Vazir Bávdin on the people of Junágad in the Maiya case is well-known, that the State management is unsatisfactory and that Vazir Bávdin and Purushotam Zála are all-powerful. In the Maiya case the late Diwán Bápálál and Purushotam Zála have, continues the paper, misappropriated State money, and have defrayed the expenditure of the wife of the Political Agent while that officer was away on leave. Large sums of money have been spent on the pretext of protecting the State. Government ought to speedily enquire into the matter, as it is stated by some persons that the money was given to high Government officers. The people of Junágad suffer hardship and it is the duty of Government to grant them relief.

An alleged intrigue in the Dhrángadra State and a request to the Bombay Government to enquire into it.

72. The same newspaper hears that intrigue is rife in Dhrángadra to misrepresent things to His Highness the Rája and to thereby deprive the heir-apparent of his right to the throne, and remarks that the case is likely to be similar to that of Kálubha of Jámnagar, that its correspondent has furnished it with numerous complaints about the conduct of the Rája who is a puppet in the hands of others, that the heir-apparent is a good man, that the teacher Hariharrám Narharrám will have very likely to resign as he is suspected to be at the bottom of the intrigue, and that Government ought speedily to make an independent enquiry into the subject.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Part I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

English duty on Indian silver plate and the injustice done to India.

1. In noticing Mr. Goschen's recent statement that he was unable to repeal the English duty on Indian silver plate, the Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 22nd April, says:—The refusal of the English Finance Minister to deal with the duty in this year's budget is an act of sheer injustice to India, who has been praying for its repeal for several years past. The abolition of the duty will advance the trade in Indian silver plate and will lessen the loss from exchange from which India has been grievously suffering, without inflicting any material financial loss on England. When England has compelled India to abolish the import duties on English cotton goods, her refusal to repeal the silver plate duty is a flagrant instance of her disregard to the interests of India.

The discussion in the Supreme Legislative Council of the financial statement considered a valuable concession gained by the Indian National Congress.

2. The Sind Sudhár (164), in its issue of the 13th April, writes:—The annual financial statement is published every year a few days before the 1st of April. For a number of years several newspapers and public associations in India brought to the notice of Government the necessity for discussing the budget in the Supreme Legislative Council before its being passed, and of allowing the public at large to express its opinion on it. It is a matter for congratulation that Government has after all approved of the suggestion and ordered it to be carried into effect. This reform cannot be considered an unimportant one. The Indian National Congress, a public body formed to promote the welfare of the subject-population, has met for the last four years at different centres in India, and one of the objects advocated by it has now been fulfilled. We hope that Government will gradually adopt all the other resolutions passed by the Congress.

A suggestion to hold the meeting of the Indian National Congress in London in 1890.

3. Mr. Chunilál Lallubhái Párekh, a Congress delegate, writes from Vádásinor to the Gujarát Mitră (78) of the 21st April to suggest that the Indian National Congress should meet in London in 1890, points out the advantages of the step, and remarks that the Congress will thereby draw the attention of the whole of Europe, that one Congress meeting in London will be more effective than ten or more meetings in India, that the Liberals will give their support to it, and that the eyes of the English people will thereby be opened and their sense of justice awakened.

The duty on salt and the licensed dealers in that commodity.

4. A correspondent of the Sind Sudhár (164), in its issue of the 13th April, writes:—The licensed dealers in salt, having received intelligence a few days ago from England that the duty on salt would shortly be reduced, have stopped purchasing any fresh supplies and have raised the selling price from Rs. 3-12-0 to Rs. 5 per maund. This inflicts great hardship on the people. I think the licensees should be prohibited from selling salt at more than fixed rates. It is to be hoped that some suitable arrangement will be made in the matter.

The decision of the Secretary of State for India in the Crawford case criticized.

5. The Subodh Patrika (16), in its issue of the 21st April, writes:—Mr. Crawford's dismissal from the service deprives him of his pension, which no doubt is hard; but it must be borne in mind that he has brought this loss on himself, and if anybody else was a party to it, it was those former Governors who passed over his flagrant violation of the first rule of his service and thereby emboldened him to further transgressions, and that the Secretary of State for India has held him innocent of a criminal offence on very slippery grounds. The loss of pension, therefore, is the least inconvenience he has to suffer; for, if he were to get his pension, what was to be his punishment for the deliberate grave offence which has been brought home to him in the opinion of the Commission that Lord Cross himself considers has judged him leniently? Far be it from us to regard his fall, however well deserved, in any other light than as a lamentable misfortune. His talents, his energy, his knowledge, and his shrewdness joined to the paternal freedom from prejudices of race and colour which marked the old class he belonged to would have qualified him for the highest place, had he unluckily not betaken to a reckless disregard for restraint, and such a fall as his, showing for the thousandth time that moral worth is superior to intellectual eminence and energy, must excite regret and pity; but if public morality, and indeed even the moral sense, is not to be trampled under foot, and the administration is not to be demoralized, misbehaviour such as his must not surely go unpunished. A respectable Native landholder is in jail for conduct which was inevitable in the position in which he was placed, even the Commission admit, by Mr. Crawford; and no punishment has been loudly declared in the name of purity of justice to be sufficient for the wretched subordinates who yielded to extortion or temptations exercised through his agency; but the highly-placed figure-head of this disreputable drama, it is argued by some of his friends, ought virtually to go without punishment, while the Government which has courageously dragged the festering scandal out in order to put an end to it should alone be condemned. Such is, no doubt, the aim and object of the agitation in the press which has assailed the Government of His Excellency Lord Reay for the last ten months, and it has, as would seem, partially succeeded in that aim; but it is satisfactory to find the Secretary of State for India fully appreciating the efforts of that Government under difficult circumstances and vindicating its conduct in holding the inquiry. It only now remains for Lord Reay and his Council to arrive at a satisfactory settlement of the question regarding the Mámlatdárs, which has been left to their discretion by the Secretary of State.

6. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 21st April, writes:—The decision of the Secretary of State for India in regard to the Crawford case may be accepted as satisfactory only so far that, though in setting aside the opinion of the Bombay Government it takes much for granted in favour of the accused and discounts much that is against him, it does not, considering all circumstances, do much violence to substantial justice, and is calculated to close a scandal which it were best for the public to forget. All the papers of the case are not before the public, but after all the ultimate basis of the judgment must be the evidence which was published at the time, and it would be hard to hold it worthless from top to bottom, especially after the admission of the accused that the witnesses bore him no ill-will. The Government of Bombay evidently believes in it and the Secretary of State for India does not assign a very solid reason for differing from it. The Commission, Lord Cross says, was a strong one and it sat long, but then, as a contemporary points out, it lacked all local knowledge and experience, and its remarks, quoted at the conclusion of paragraph 6 of Lord Cross's despatch, would seem to show that it has begged the main question on a priori grounds; because after saying that the accused was under greater temptation to corruption than other men, it adds that "in the mind of any man of Mr. Crawford's antecedents and holding the position he held, there must be a wide gulf between the most reckless borrowing and actual corruption." But even under the most favourable aspect of the case, the Commission found that the responsibility of placing Hanmantráo, an agent and confidant of the accused, admittedly employed to transact his monetary business, "in a position in which he could improperly obtain money rests upon Mr. Crawford," and the report of the Commission on his indebtedness, so ostentatiously admitted by the accused, discloses to the view of the Secretary of State for India "a condition of things altogether lamentable and inconsistent with the possibility of a proper administration of the division at the head of which he was placed,—indeed of the due performance of his public duties anywhere," and all this in spite of the very first rule of the service. It is ridiculous to contend that this indebtedness was known to Government or condoned in the past, as that which was condoned is not covered by the late inquiry. Further, that condonation was a lapse of public duty on the part of the then Government, and if it proceeded from goodness it has only tended to a further transgression of the rule more recklessly than before. The order of Lord Cross, therefore, is, as we have observed, upon the whole fair, and we have seen that the Times accepts it. Anything short of it would have been an aggravation of a public scandal which, as we have said at starting, ought best to be forgotten. It is painful in the extreme to see such an end to such a career. The fall indeed is a great one and it is sad to reflect on it; but it would be merest hypocrisy to ignore that it is the natural outline of those "brilliant defects" which accompanied the brilliant qualities of the accused, and it would be a dangerous blow to the purity of the public administration to disregard the requirements of public justice even in obedience to compassion for an offending individual. The force of this observation will be realised even by hostile critics of His Excellency Lord Reay's Government if they imagine in the position of Mr. Crawford a Native officer with more than his merits and only half his faults, and we suggest this comparison only to put the matter clearly and without the remotest reference to prejudice of colour or creed. The decision in this case, therefore, is both just and expedient. Its moral effects would have been lost if it had been less than what it is. The matter, therefore, ought to rest there. Partisan prejudices and passions would no doubt serve to keep up hostile criticism of the Bombay Government, and the London paper, we see, uses the case as a peg even to decry His Excellency Lord Reay's entire rule as a failure; but this is a phase of the subject which we must commend to the attention of the Indian Telegraph Union whose inaction cannot but tend to keep English public opinion on Indian burning questions ignorant of "the other side." But it is enough to observe here that the Secretary of State for India fully supports the action of the Government, and holds that in the information which has been placed before it, it had no other course open but to order the inquiry it did. This is a sufficient condemnation of the agitation which was started and kept up to the prejudice of Lord Reay's Government on this very account. The Mámlatdárs' case has been committed by Lord Cross to the care of the Bombay Government, which, we have no doubt, will dispose of it in the best way possible. We may notice the matter hereafter. In concluding, we shall only ask the reader to recur to the great defect in our present administrative system, which keeps the Government at head-quarters out of touch with the people and on which we dwelt some time ago as being clearly illustrated by the history of the present unfortunate case.

7. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 20th April, writes:—The decision in the Crawford case will scarcely create any surprise. The Secretary of State for India decides against Mr. Crawford on the charge of indebtedness which the accused never denied. On the charge of corruption Mr. Crawford has been acquitted, or perhaps has been given the benefit of the doubt. Mr. Crawford is dismissed from the Civil Service—a very heavy punishment after the intense and long suspense to which the unfortunate officer has had to submit.

8. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 21st April, writes:—Mr. Crawford is unfit to continue in the public service. Technically speaking Mr. Crawford is convicted of reckless borrowing only, although surrounded on all sides, but still himself miraculously uncontaminated, by corruption and extortion. But if we have to go beyond printed evidence, if we are allowed to take antecedents into consideration—and here let us repeat our regret that the prosecution did not enlighten the Commissioners on the point of Mr. Crawford's antecedents,—this distilled and tasteless technicality of law will at once soften in common parlance, and that too not quite unreasonably, into "acceptance of illegal gratification for showing favour or forbearing to show disfavour in the exercise of official functions," as the Bombay Government have expressed it. The Secretary of State for India at such a distance might not be able to act otherwise than he did; but those on the spot will always claim to know better of the nature and character of the evidence and witnesses before the Commission. It would have been more in the interests of justice, and in a certain sense of the accused himself, if Lord Cross had respected this local feeling in pronouncing his judgment instead of in awarding the punishment only. But the rigidity that was not exercised on one side has come with a double force on the other, and there is Mr. Crawford a ruined man after such a brilliant career, which was almost at its close, with a favourable verdict on the more serious count but a crushing sentence on the lighter one. He has the consolation of knowing that technically he is all but convicted on the main charge of corruption by two authorities out of three.

What such a consolation is worth in the face of the above facts we cannot know. We really feel sorry for Mr. Crawford, but cannot say that he did not call this punishment down on himself.

9. The Satyă Shodhak (57), in its issue of the 21st April, writes:—It would have looked very awkward and would have been a direct insult to the Commissioners if Lord Cross had overruled their unanimous decision and convicted Mr. Crawford of corruption. The means which the Commissioners had before them for arriving at a correct decision were wanting with Lord Cross. His Lordship naturally therefore gave weight to the judgment of the Commission. Some newspapers consider it unjust on the part of Government to dismiss Mr. Crawford from the public service on such a charge as indebtedness. But we think that considering the grave delinquencies of Mr. Crawford the punishment is by no means severe.

10. The Hindu Punch (31), in its issue of the 25th April, says:—We feel satisfaction at the decision of the Secretary of State for India in the Crawford case. We never expected that the claims of justice would be so scrupulously recognised by Lord Cross in this affair. We feel also very sorry for poor Mr. Crawford. Mr. Crawford's is a living warning to all vicious Anglo-Indians. We suspect that many Anglo-Indian officials are similarly involved as Mr. Crawford. Government should make secret inquiries and bring to book the offenders, if any. On the whole the punishment meted out to Mr. Crawford cannot be said to be very severe. He must thank the Bombay Government and the Commissioners for this leniency.

11. The Bakul (22), in its issue of the 21st April, writing about the decision of the Secretary of State for India in the Crawford case, says:—Mr. Crawford is not an ordinary man. There are very few men of his stamp even among Europeans. His brilliant abilities, his charm of manners, and his administrative capacity are unrivalled. When during the régime of Lord Ripon the scheme of local self-government was being discussed, Mr. Crawford nobly took the side of the Natives and procured for them that much-valued right. His sympathy for Natives and active interest in their welfare and progress may, we suspect, have much to do with the unfavourable decision that has been given in his case. They talk about the corruption of Mr. Crawford; but look at the Deccan mining scandals. Compared with that gigantic fraud Mr. Crawford's alleged corruption dwarfs into insignificance. They make much of his indebtedness; but are there no European officers in the Bombay Presidency who are similarly situated? Mr. Beames, although convicted of the offence of borrowing within his jurisdiction, was retained in Government service, while Mr. Crawford is dismissed from it. Some may say that the State Secretary's decision satisfies fully the requirements of public justice. We doubt that very much.

12. The Sind Times (5), in its issue of the 20th April, writes:—The immense achievement of the Bombay Government in having, at a cost of more than a lákh and a half of rupees and of many months, during which a grave public scandal has been in agitation tending to bring the administration of the presidency into contempt; at a cost, too, of the reputation of His Excellency the Governor in respect of the utter want of tact, sagacity and magnanimity,—of all the qualities, in short, that should distinguish a Governor, displayed at every turn of the proceedings; at the cost of the exposure of flagrant corruption pervading the lower ranks of the Native magistracy,—an exposure which may possibly be beneficial hereafter in guiding public opinion aright in estimating the value to the public service of this class of officials, but which is mischievous in injuring the prestige of the Government;—this achievement, we say, the dismissal of Mr. Crawford from the Civil Service for improperly borrowing money, seems to us remarkably paltry, a very ridiculous mouse indeed after the prolonged and Titanic labours of the mountain. If the Bombay citizens have any generosity and gratitude, as we believe them to have, and if they have a touch of the spirit of pugnacity that is properly aroused against the petty vindictiveness of brief authority, they will mark their sense of Mr. Crawford's past services to them and to the State by raising a subscription that shall put him beyond the reach of malice. We feel convinced that in the present state of public feeling an appeal for this purpose would be promptly and widely responded to. We commend the suggestion to the Times of India, which journal, we believe, most accurately represents the public spirit of Bombay. The Commissioners having found that Mr. Crawford was not guilty on the charges of corruption, Lord Reay takes upon himself to state that he is of opinion that the evidence establishes beyond all reasonable doubt that Mr. Crawford was guilty. If anything were wanted to betray the animus which has actuated the Bombay Government in the course pursued towards Mr. Crawford, the extraordinary conduct above-noted would amply supply the omission. The Secretary of State for India, who is evidently inclined to be lenient towards Lord Reay, finds it necessary to observe that he is bound to attach great weight to the fact that the charges of corruption have been enquired into by a very strong Commission, the members of which during a sitting of no less than 67 days had the advantage (which neither the Government of Bombay nor the Secretary of State could have) of seeing and hearing witnesses, and that in their opinion none of the charges of corruption are established. Naturally, therefore, the Secretary of State is not prepared to overrule the Commissioners as to any of these charges, and has decided not to disturb their finding on them. Lord Reay apparently has no such scruples; and of his having displayed vindictiveness towards Mr. Crawford, most men will be of one opinion.

13. The Rást Goftár (82), in its issue of the 21st April, writes:—The most satisfactory feature of the Secretary of State's despatch is his full appreciation of the efforts made by His Excellency the Governor in Council to ascertain "under painful and difficult circumstances" the truth in this case. Such a declaration would have been justly due to Lord Reay under any circumstances. But it comes with singular appropriateness after the vile clamour which was raised around him, because he was moved by an unflinching determination to do his duty, however painful it might be. That duty he has done well and fearlessly, and for doing it so well he has earned the gratitude of those at least who thought that justice must be done even though Mr. Crawford should fall.

14. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 25th April, writes:—Whatever be the end of the Crawford case we think great credit is due to His Excellency Lord Reay and his Government for the bold stand they have made in the interests of justice and purity. Several Anglo-Indian newspapers had tried to throw dirt on the Bombay Government by ignoring the real issues of the case and going into irrelevant cant. But it is a satisfaction to know that the Secretary of State for India has entirely approved of the action of the Bombay Government and given an indirect rebuke to the cavillers, both in England and in India.

15. The Surat Akhbár (83) of the 22nd April approves of the dismissal of Mr. Crawford from the service, and says that the entire public think that the Bombay Government have acted with good motive in the matter and that the people wish that His Excellency Lord Reay should remain in office for five years more. The Gujarát Mitră (78) of the 21st April also approves of Lord Cross's decision, refers to his agreeing with the Commissioners in their acquittal of Mr. Crawford on the charges of corruption and disagreeing with the opinion of the Bombay Government in the matter, and takes Lord Cross to task for disregarding the opinion of the Commission of Inquiry and of the Bombay Government in the Cambay case, while he has in the Crawford case accepted the opinion of the Commission of Inquiry. The Hitechchhu (79) of Ahmedabad of the 25th April animadverts on the acquittal of Mr. Crawford on the charges of corruption and bribery, infers that he has been punished really for corruption and bribery, and remarks that the decision arrived at on the point is partial, evasive and likely to encourage corrupt officers.

16. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 22nd April, writes:—The Secretary of State's decision in the Crawford case will cause the deepest disappointment and regret throughout the presidency. There is indeed a feeling of pity abroad that so brilliant a career should have ended in dismissal and misery, but it is not so much in the punishment as in the conviction that the public was interested, and on this point there is a feeling of disappointment. Lord Cross acquits Mr. Crawford on the charges of corruption, but dismisses him from the service on the ground of indebtedness. But just and not too severe as is the sentence, there is one point on which the Indian public will not, we apprehend, be satisfied, and that is the acquittal on the charges of corruption. On this point Lord Cross's decision is in conflict with the prevailing moral conviction of, we venture to think, the entire Indian public, excluding a few personal friends of Mr. Crawford. Lord Cross gives his decision apparently against his own conviction, and on a ground which would make all appeals on facts absolutely nugatory. The Commissioners have acquitted Mr. Crawford on the charges of corruption. What the precise ground of their decision is is not yet known, but it is generally believed that they readily swallowed the notorious Bráhman conspiracy theory propounded by the ingenious counsel for the accused. How utterly ridiculous and unfounded that theory is we have often shown, and we believe the Government of Bombay too entirely discredit it in their despatch. But, strange enough, the Commission appears to have adopted this theory, and the Secretary of State could not have come to the conclusion he did without adopting it likewise. His Lordship says :—"With regard to the charges of corruption, whatever might have been my opinion if I had been called upon to decide this matter upon the printed evidence alone, I feel bound to attach great weight to the fact that they have been inquired into by a strong Commission, the members of which, during a sitting of no less than 67 days, had the advantage (which neither the Government of Bombay nor the Secretary of State could have) of seeing and hearing the witnesses, and that, in their opinion, none of the charges of corruption are established." However high the standing of the Commissioners, and whatever the length of the inquiry they carried on, the fact remains that they were utter strangers to Bombay, that they showed a decided bias in favour of the accused from the very commencement of the trial as appeared from their occasional remarks reported at the time, and that their decision is entirely against the weight of a vast mass of evidence. Against this the Government of Bombay, composed of four members of a decidedly more eminent position than the Commissioners, possessing far superior advantages of local knowledge and experience, and acting under a greater sense of responsibility, come to a conclusion thoroughly adverse to the accused. The Government of Bombay, who are by law proper judges, decide that the evidence establishes beyond all reasonable doubt that Mr. Crawford did accept illegal gratification for showing favour and forbearing to show disfavour in the exercise of his official functions. This opinion, so deliberately formed, the Secretary of State sets aside in favour of that of the Commissioners, who were admittedly called in merely to record evidence and to report on it. This treatment by the Secretary of State of the opinion of the responsible Government of this presidency in a matter of the gravest importance to the efficiency, purity and honour of the whole higher administration of the province is not calculated to strengthen the prestige of the Government. We do not indeed mean that the Government should be supported in every case in which they take a strong view on one side or the other, but in the present instance the Government was backed by the enlightened opinion of the whole presidency. They perceived how Mr. Crawford's proceedings had come to be regarded by the public as a great scandal demanding prompt investigation, and to what extent the subordinate service was being demoralized and vitiated. They knew precisely the conditions under which the enquiry was instituted and carried on. Under the circumstances the Secretary of State would have, we venture to think, exercised a wise discretion if he had given preference to the opinion of the Government of Bombay rather than to that of the Commissioners. The effect of the decision is that no amount of Native testimony is of any value against the word of a single European, and that it is hopeless to obtain a conviction against a European offender, however notorious his offence. This is not by any means an edifying and encouraging spectacle to the Native community; nor is the demoralizing effect on the European officials the less serious. An officer, provided he is sufficiently high-placed and has friends to agitate in his favour, may defy public opinion and even the local Government. This aspect of the case suggests some serious reflections which we shall refer to in detail in a future issue. Suffice it to say for the present that the Native public, and a considerable section of the European public too, as far as we have been able to gauge their opinion, can never, we believe, reconcile themselves to the verdict of Lord Cross on the charges of corruption against Mr. Crawford. The verdict, we are afraid, will ever be pointed to as a parody of British justice, and it will go down to posterity as a palpable instance of how impossible it was under British rule in India to obtain justice against a European official, even though his offence was a matter of common notoriety among the people, and when the local Government was courageous enough to institute an inquiry and to pronounce a just verdict. The only redeeming feature in the Secretary of State's despatch is that it approves of His Excellency Lord Reay's action and justifies the proceedings His Lordship took in reference to the trial. Lord Reay's enemies are still unremitting in their endeavours to vilify him. The London Times and its namesake in Bombay still find cause for expressing condemnation on some pretext or other, however unfounded or exploded. Now Lord Reay is blamed for not immediately publishing the Commissioners' report and acting on it. Was it proper on the part of the Bombay Government to publish the report when the Secretary of State forbade its publication to act upon it when they saw grave reasons for differing from the Commissioners? Surely public criticism has come to a strange pass if it has to rest itself on such wilfully perverse and consciously false grounds. We should not wonder if the London Thunderer becomes utterly discredited in regard to its criticism on Indian matters as it has already become in regard to Irish affairs, and should not be surprised if the same fate overtook our local contemporary. In any case it is a strange irony of fate that some of the English and Anglo-Indian newspapers should seek to vilify the responsible head of a British administration for endeavouring to purify the rule and maintain the honour of their own race. It is pleasing to note, however, that Lord Reay has found a supporter in Lord Cross and that the efforts of his opponents to discredit him have to that extent proved fruitless.

17. The Kesari (38), in its issue of the 23rd April, writes:—The decision of the Secretary of State for India in the Crawford case is far from satisfactory. It is objectionable on three grounds. In the first place, Mr. Crawford is acquitted of corruption, the charge on which from the mass and force of evidence it was almost expected he would be convicted. In the second place, much weight seems to have been attached to the charge of indebtedness, and that has been made the chief ground of conviction, which however was not necessary as the accused had himself confessed to that charge. Thirdly, the punishment meted out seems to be out of proportion to the guilt laid at Mr. Crawford's door. It would have been better justice if the Secretary of State for India had fully acquiesced in the report of the Government of Bombay. The Secretary of State for India seems to have attempted the impossible feat of satisfying both the Commissioners and the Bombay Government in arriving at such a decision. Lord Cross's despatch about this painful affair insinuates more than it plainly expresses, and on this ground also it is liable to objection. It would have argued much moral courage and sense of justice on the part of His Lordship if there had been more clearness and decisiveness in this decision.

18. The Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 22nd April, writes:—The inordinately harsh sentence passed by Lord Cross on Mr. Crawford is calculated to raise a suspicion in the minds of the readers of the despatch that, notwithstanding his apparent reluctance to disturb the finding of the Commission on the charges of corruption, His Lordship was after all satisfied about the guilt of that distinguished officer on the said charges. This view is somewhat corroborated by the opening sentence in paragraph 3 of the despatch. Now if this view be correct, it is difficult to understand why Lord Cross should not have displayed the requisite moral courage to affirm his view and to find Mr. Crawford guilty on the charges of corruption, just in the same way as the Bombay Government have done. Lord Cross has accordingly placed himself on the horns of a dilemma, and we are sorry to observe that a Minister of Her Imperial Majesty the Queen-Empress should have by his own equivocal decision laid himself liable to be found fault with for great pusillanimity. When it is borne in mind that it was this self-same Secretary of State for India who did not feel any scruples to set aside the finding of the Commission in the Cambay case, even when it was upheld by the Bombay Government which had had at that time the rare advantage of having among its members the late Sir M. Melvill, it becomes more difficult than ever to reconcile His Lordship's refusal to overrule the finding of the Commission on the charges of corruption with the inordinately heavy sentence he has passed on Mr. Crawford, as if he had been convicted of corruption. The Commission was undoubtedly very strong, and even when the finding on facts of a competent special jury is not rejected by the law-courts, it was of course a foregone conclusion that the finding on facts of such a very strong Commission as that which tried Mr. Crawford could not be set aside by the Secretary of State. It would, therefore, have been consistent with the respect displayed by Lord Cross for the Commission's finding on the graver charge, if His Lordship, in consideration of Mr. Crawford's splendid services to the State in various capacities, had resisted the temptation of insisting upon the proverbial "one pound of flesh," and had allowed him to retire on pension. It is to be hoped that the Secretary of State will yet see his way to modify his orders on the subject, more especially in consideration of the fact that Mr. Crawford's indebtedness was on a former occasion condoned by three successive Governments of Bombay and could not have been unknown even to the present Government.

19. The Sudhárak (17), in its issue of the 22nd April, writes:—Like all compromises, the decision of Lord Cross with regard to Mr. Crawford fails to entirely please either party. It is true that even if His Lordship had distinctly pronounced Mr. Crawford guilty of corruption, the punishment awarded could not have been higher, as dismissal is the highest penalty prescribed by the rules of administration. But we still feel that there is a slight mockery of justice in the fact that a man whose corrupt practices were so notorious, and who manifested so much unscrupulousness in the conduct of his defence, should be able to proclaim to the world that he has come out of a "thorough" investigation with clean hands. We have very good reason to believe that Lord Cross himself was inclined to agree with the Bombay Government, which held that there was no shadow of reasonable doubt that Mr. Crawford did accept illegal gratification to show favour to, or not to visit with his displeasure, those who were serving under him. His Lordship is careful not to say that he endorses the conclusions of the Commissioners; he merely contents himself with saying that he feels bound to attach great weight to those conclusions, that he is not prepared to overrule them, and that therefore he leaves them undisturbed. Possibly Lord Cross could have pronounced a more distinct verdict if he had carefully gone through the whole evidence. However, we are satisfied that the corrupter of public morality is no longer allowed to remain in Government service, and that we are not insulted with the spectacle of his retiring on pension and with "the honours of war." One part of the Secretary of State's despatch gives us unalloyed pleasure, and that is when he says that he fully appreciates Lord Reay's efforts to ascertain truth under painful and difficult circumstances. This exceedingly well-deserved compliment will afford some consolation to His Lordship, who is still being pursued with shameful rancour by several unscrupulous prints for the manly part he has played throughout this affair.

20. The Gujarát Gazette (76), in its issue of the 25th April, writes:—This much we can affirm that the punishment will prove a very severe one to Mr. Crawford. The mental agony which he must have been in since the time he was suspended must be sufficient to bring repentance, and this loss of pension, perhaps his only income, and the degradation of being dismissed are more than, we fear, Mr. Crawford will be able to bear. As it is, however, it is a punishment, and severe or mild it must be borne.

21. The Shri Shivdji (60), in its issue of the 19th April, says:—We are not at all surprised at the decision given by the Secretary of State for India in the Crawford case. Mr. Crawford's acquittal on the more serious charges, viz., those of corruption, was a foregone conclusion. That a European officer of his position and his brilliant abilities would be convicted of any offence was not to be expected. In the case of European offenders, judges, however eminent in learning and irreproachable in character, are always found to lean on one side. Impartiality is rare in these days. On the whole, the decision is favourable to Mr. Crawford and points a moral which our people should lay to their hearts, viz., that in complicated cases where Europeans are involved, we should keep ourselves as aloof from them as possible.

22. The Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 23rd April, says:—The thirty-two charges laid by the Bombay Government against Mr. Crawford were preferred after a careful enquiry and consideration, and yet the Crawford Commission, whose report Lord Cross has adopted, has acquitted the accused of the graver charges of corruption. On the other hand, Sir Raymond West in his review of the report, in which the Bombay Government have concurred, holds that Mr. Crawford did accept illegal gratification as established in the evidence for the prosecution. The reason of these contrary views is that the Commissioners considered each charge by itself and analyzed the evidence for it, while Sir Raymond West judged the whole case by the cumulative effect of the entire evidence. The latter method of appreciation is sound and in general practice. The inherent frailty ascribed by Sir Raymond West to Bráhman witnesses is not peculiar to this class of people; it is natural to Native character, and it is to be hoped that all European judges will bear this in mind in the appreciation of Native evidence.

23. The Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 23rd April, says:—The publication of the Commissioners' report in the Crawford case and of the minutes of the Bombay Government reviewing it has confirmed the public opinion that in this case the Bombay Government have committed several mistakes. It was a grave mistake to give a promise of indemnification to a number of Mámlatdárs who had confessed to a criminal charge in order to bring evidence against Mr. Crawford, and it was worse to try to prove the propriety of this promise. It was also a great blunder to appoint a big Commission to investigate the charges preferred against Mr. Crawford, and it was still worse to advance reasons for discrediting the conclusion arrived at by the Commissioners who were purposely brought from the Bengal Presidency. It is asserted in Sir Raymond West's minute that it was a very difficult task for the Commission to properly appreciate the evidence of the Bráhman witnesses, as they (the Commissioners) were not acquainted with the administrative arrangements of the Bombay Presidency and were ignorant of the way in which Bráhman witnesses give evidence. This argument of the Bombay Government is quite late now, and should have been thought of before appointing Bengal civilians on the Commission. The object of the Bombay Government in instituting enquiries into Mr. Crawford's conduct was, no doubt, most praiseworthy, inasmuch as the purity of the service to which he belonged had to be preserved, but the above-mentioned mistakes have seriously disfigured that object. It is gratifying that Lord Cross should have instructed the Bombay Government to deprive the Magistrates who have given bribes of their powers, and it is to be hoped that the Bombay Government will promptly carry out his instructions. The Commission has recorded its opinion that Messrs. Pendse, Yádavráo, Deshmukh and Patwardhan have been guilty of getting up evidence against Mr. Crawford, and it is the duty of the Bombay Government to duly consider this accusation. [The Akhbáre Sodágar (87), in its issue of the same date, regrets that the Bombay Government should have, in the minute reviewing the Commissioners' report in the Crawford case, advocated the retention of the self-incriminated Mámlatdárs in the service, and is glad to find that Lord Cross has issued instructions to deprive the delinquents of their magisterial powers.]

24. Several other newspapers of the week write upon the decision of the Secretary of State for India in the Crawford case, approve of the verdict of Lord Cross, defend the Bombay Government and applaud His Excellency Lord Reay for his moral courage. A few of them disapprove of Lord Cross acquitting Mr. Crawford on the more serious charges of corruption and bribery, consider that the punishment meted out to him is rather severe if borrowing is his only guilt, and pity the sad end of a career which has been so brilliant and fruitful.

A general pardon to all the Mámlatdárs concerned in the Crawford case proposed.

25. The Poona Vaibhav (43), in its issue of the 21st April, says:—Now that the Secretary of State for India has decided the Crawford case it would be an act of justice and mercy on the part of Government to decide, as early as possible, the fate of the Mámlatdárs concerned in the case and to review the case of poor Hanmantráo. It is no use now making any distinction between those Mámlatdárs who paid for their own undeserved promotion and those who paid fearing that they might be degraded or sent to unhealthy stations. Government should now issue a general amnesty to all the parties concerned and end this disgusting affair once for all.

The Mámlatdárs concerned in the Crawford case and a suggestion to the Bombay Government.

26. The Praja Mat (124), in its issue of the 20th April, refers to the self-incriminated Mámlatdárs in the Crawford case, points out the advisability of appointing a commission or a special officer to enquire into the corruption or otherwise of the Mámlatdárs in general and their kárkuns, and requests the Government of His Excellency Lord Reay to nominate either Mr. Lee-Warner or Mr. Crawley-Boevey or some officer of their stamp for the purpose.

27. The Káthiáwár Times (81), in its issue of the 21st April, writes:—The Crawford scandal has added another grace to the triumphant administration of His Excellency Lord Reay, who will certainly be known to posterity as the best Governor Bombay has ever had. We ask His Excellency to dismiss the self-condemned Ráo Sáhebs and Ráo Bahádurs who have purchased favour and places and avoided supersessions and transfers, as in acting as they have done their moral guilt has doubtless been established. The conduct of Mr. Pendse in the witness-box and those of his companions should also be noted.

The Bombay Government censured for not sending copies of Lord Cross's decision in the Crawford case to the vernacular press when the same were supplied to the Bombay English dailies.

28. The Akhbáre Sodágar (87), in its issue of the 22nd April, regrets that the Bombay Government should have failed to send copies of the decision of the Secretary of State for India in the Crawford case to the vernacular press when they were given to the local English newspapers, observing that it was a great injustice to the Native public and the vernacular press which took great interest in Mr. Crawford's trial and showed much anxiety to learn the result, and expresses a hope that such invidious distinction will not be made in future in the treatment of the two branches of the public press.

Injustice done to the daily vernacular newspapers of Bombay in not furnishing them with copies of the papers in the Crawford case.

29. The Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 24th April, observes:—The Government of India treat the principal English and Native newspapers in Bombay alike by supplying them at one and the same time with telegrams, books and pamphlets, while the Bombay Government act with the latter in a different way altogether. The result of the Crawford case was awaited with great anxiety by all classes of the people, and it was sanguinely expected that copies of the despatch of the Secretary of State for India would be supplied by the Bombay Secretariat to the different daily newspapers on Tuesday last. As we did not get a copy of the document till the evening of that day we sent a telegram to Mahábaleshvar and received the reply that a copy had been supplied to the Times of India and the Bombay Gazette. Notwithstanding this we managed to publish the substance of Lord Cross's despatch in our issue of Wednesday. Government could not have intended to supply the English press alone with a copy of the document, keeping the Native public ignorant of the important decision. On the evening of Saturday last the two local English dailies alone were furnished with copies of the Commissioners' report, the minute of the Bombay Government and the evidence produced before the Commission, again ignoring the vernacular dailies. However, similar copies were sent to the Jáme Jamshed on the following Monday morning, but, strange to say, they were taken back the next day, Tuesday! Is this due encouragement to the vernacular press, which is as much public press as the Anglo-Indian newspapers are? It is to be hoped that the injustice thus done to the vernacular press will not be repeated under the liberal administration of His Excellency Lord Reay, who cannot be supposed to be aware of it. [The Akhbáre Sodágar (87), in its issue of the 25th April, makes a similar complaint.]

30. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 17th April, writes:—From the beginning of His Excellency Lord Reay's administration it was evident that it would not be one of those uneventful stewardships of which the distinguishing feature is their negative character, which leave no mark upon the history of the people or the province and let things take their usual course. We do not know whether such a milk-and-water policy is at any time productive of any good, but Lord Reay gave unmistakable signs at the outset of his career that he had other notions of duty than merely to let matters take their ordinary course "along the line of least resistance." "To improve and to strengthen the administration" was the clear conception of Lord Reay's duty, and he set about his task with the firmness of conviction and the earnestness begotten of honesty. His broad liberalism and his personal character made him at once a popular Governor among all classes, but the tide began to turn when it was found that he was determined, according to his own lights, to improve the administration. He had also the misfortune to arrive at a time when race-feeling was running high and the different sections of the community were watching with intense eagerness the proclivities of every new proconsul. No time was lost in dubbing a Governor or Viceroy anti-This or pro-That. As Lord Reay never showed any desire to conceal his sympathies for the subject-population he was early set down as another bidder for popular applause, as an administrator who was setting his cap at the leaders of the people to win their approbation. This feeling spread with the celerity with which prejudice always spreads, and ominous whisperings began filling the air. His unpopularity with the Anglo-Indian community was hastened by the trial of Mr. Wilson of Cambay fame. There is nothing so marvellous in this country as the solidarity of feeling that links the services in this country in a strange masonic brotherhood. There are mutual jealousies and internal disturbances, but every attack from outside is repelled by a united front. An unnamed horror of publicity is another weakness specially acquired in this country. If there be any black sheep in the service he may be cordially disliked, and yet very few wish that he should be exposed. When an offender is brought to justice there is a feeling of sudden or loud resentment, because the service is disgraced and a blot is cast upon it. Whatever the result of the Crawford case may be and whatever the passion of party may lead men to say against Lord Reay, there can be no doubt as to the verdict of posterity on his administration. In the Crawford case, as in everything else, the present Governor of Bombay has been actuated by the single idea of doing his duty with all the honesty, firmness and devotion of which his strong Scotch nature is capable. [The Káthiáwádi (80), in its issue of the 23rd April, refers to His Excellency Lord Reay's recent address to the Bombay Chamber of Commerce, praises him, and says that since his assuming the reins of office not a single day must have passed without his doing some small but good act for the welfare of the people, and that the people are so much pleased with his administration that they would not be displeased if he were to continue in office for ten years more. The paper also publishes verses in praise of His Excellency.]

His Excellency Lord Reay's sudden visit to Porbandar approved.

31. The Gujarát Darpan (75), in its issue of the 21st April, expresses approval of the recent sudden visit of His Excellency Lord Reay to Porbandar while returning from Karáchi to Bombay, says that such sudden visits bring to light the real state of things, and adds that His Excellency's recent sudden visits to Porbandar and Surat will make the officers throughout the presidency act vigilantly. [The Deshi Mitră (98) of the 25th April also approves of His Excellency Lord Reay's sudden visit to Porbandar.]

His Excellency Lord Reay's recent address to the Bombay Chamber of Commerce and a suggestion in connection with it.

32. The Subodh Patrika (16), in its issue of the 21st April, writes:—In addressing the Bombay Chamber of Commerce the other day on some of the financial affairs of the presidency, His Excellency Lord Reay made a wholesome departure from the usual official line of conduct in such matters. The departure is the more noticeable as there was no special occasion for it and was perfectly unsolicited. Whatever differences of views and opinions there may be between the rulers and the ruled—and even after any amount of explanation such differences continue to exist where the same matters are viewed from different standpoints—yet there is no doubt that such occasional opportunities for insight into the very pulse of the administrative machine will do much to justify the actions of Government in the eyes of the people and conciliate public opinion, which is the great object of such official explanations. As the present has been the first instance of its kind we hope it shall not be the last even during Lord Reay's tenure of office. Once in a year, if not oftener—say, when the Government leaves for the hills at the close of the financial year—it may be well to put together in an address a few things which may either want the light of official explanation or may require amendment or improvement, and thus furnish an occasion to draw out the head of the Government for the time being. The larger the audience addressed on such occasions the better—not this or that particular body or section of the public exclusively, however intelligent and well-informed it may be, but the representatives of the public in general, who will appreciate the honour of thus being taken into confidence by their Governor.

The policy of reduction in expenditure by the Bombay Government criticised.

33. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 21st April, writes:—The work of reduction is still going on. The Bombay Government intend making a reduction of some Rs. 43,000 in the Police Department. Here we must warn the Government that the public will hardly approve of this reduction. The Police Department is not so efficient that it can afford to give up so many thousands of rupees. The police force is known to be inefficient and the money about to be saved may be usefully employed in raising the salaries so as to allure better men into the service. Similarly we deplore the necessity of reducing the grants to the hospitals. The hospitals are very beneficent institutions, and yet we have not arrived at that state when the public can be called upon to maintain them. The old vaidyas and hakims are yet in existence and in a good many families there is genuine prejudice against doctors and hospitals. His Excellency Lord Reay was right in observing that "when you retrench Government grants to dispensaries you are within a measurable distance of exhausting further possibilities of retrenchment." The demand of the Government of India is a very uncertain quantity to deal with. It is possible it may come again in more embarrassing form. It behoves the Government to see if no further reduction can be made in other departments.

Mr. E. C. K. Ollivant's appointment as Political Agent, Káthiáwár, approved.

34. In noticing the appointment of Mr. E. C. K. Ollivant, C.I.E., as Political Agent, Káthiáwár, the Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 27th April, says:—Mr. Ollivant is an able officer, well-versed in solving difficulties and can appreciate abilities in others. But unfortunately he has failed as Municipal Commissioner, Bombay, in conserving the public interests and in keeping the people in good humour. He has not been popular on account of his habit of trying to carry out things according to his own inclinations. Most of the work performed by him in his capacity of Municipal Commissioner has failed to satisfy the public, and the draft of the new Bombay Municipal Act, in preparing which he had assisted, was particularly unsatisfactory. The people of Bombay will not therefore be sorry at his approaching departure. [In writing on the same subject, the Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the same date, says that Mr. Ollivant is an able and discreet officer and there is great likelihood of his proving a successful administrator of the province of Káthiáwár.]

Mr. M. H. Hakim's appointment as Judge of the Small Cause Court, Karáchi, disapproved on the ground of his not being a native of the province.

35. The Sind Sudhár (164), in its issue of the 13th April, writes:—In our last issue we said that we were very glad to hear of the appointment of Mr. Muhamad Husain Hakim as Judge of the Small Cause Court at Karáchi in place of Mr. Pinhey; but we think it our duty to point out that the gentleman appointed is not a native of Sind. For the ends of justice, and the convenience of parties, as well as in the interests of Government, we always suggested that natives of Sind should be entrusted with the administration of justice, for strangers, being unacquainted with the manners and customs of the people, will not be equally useful. We hope that Government will be pleased to attend to the suggestion and to take steps to encourage the people of Sind. In 1887, when His Excellency Lord Reay first visited Sind, he said in reply to the Sind Sabha's address that in filling up appointments he would favourably consider the claims of the people of Sind. Government ought to fulfil that promise. This was a very good opportunity for Government to appoint a competent and experienced native of Sind as Judge of the Small Cause Court at Karáchi.

The claims of Mr. Shivshankar Govindrám to the permanent post of a Presidency Magistrate, Bombay.

36. The Din Bandhu (7), in its issue of the 21st April, writes:—It is strange to find that when a permanent vacancy occurred the claims of Mr. Shivshankar were overlooked and the appointment was given to Mr. Hamilton. Up to very late Bombay has enjoyed the privilege of claiming two out of the three Presidency Magistrates as natives of India; but it is sad to find that at present all the three Magistrates are Europeans. Such an occurrence was hardly expected during the régime of so popular a Governor as Lord Reay. But we often find that the unexpected takes place. We are however glad that Lord Reay's Government has again appointed Mr. Shivshankar to act as Presidency Magistrate, and we hope that on the occurrence of a permanent vacancy Mr. Shivshankar's claims will not be ignored. The post of Presidency Magistrate is one of the few prizes open to the natives of India, and it is but just to expect that preference should be given to a native of the soil over his European competitor.

Alleged partiality in the trial of the Golden Gang case at the last Criminal Sessions of the Bombay High Court.

37. The Rást Goftár (82), in its issue of the 21st April, writes:—Purity of justice is a great moral force on which a foreign Government may rely, and it is justly regarded as one of the blessings of the British rule. But although the Natives consider themselves happy under the just laws of their rulers, there is a widespread feeling among them that when a white man is concerned in any offence he is generally not dealt with impartially, and that the more serious the offence the greater are the chances of his being let off. The jury of his own countrymen who sit in judgment upon him are too often ready to give him "the benefit of the doubt," even where the evidence is so convincing as to leave no room for doubt whatever. Such was the benefit given by a jury at the last Criminal Sessions of the Bombay High Court to the European soldier who shot down a Native, and such is the benefit given by a jury at the present Sessions to Guard Spink, a member of the "Golden Gang." Mr. Justice Bayley presided at the Sessions. The jury, or rather a majority of them, for the verdict was 6 to 3, was evidently resolved not to be convinced of the prisoner's guilt, and so he was discharged. The offence was of a most serious nature. It affected the public much more than the railway company, and the public has a right to expect that in cases of such importance, where an average common jury may from bias or stupidity give a wrong verdict, a special jury should be empannelled. But before this plan is adopted, great care should be exercised to have such men only as special jurors whose position and worth may afford some guarantee of their impartiality and intelligence.

The case of police torture of a Native female in a village in the Coimbatore District and the punishment of the offenders.

38. The Káthiáwár Times (81), in its issue of the 24th April, refers to a shocking case of police torture of a Native woman in a village in the Coimbatore District reported by the Hindu newspaper, in which the Sessions Judge sentenced the principal offender to five years' rigorous imprisonment and his accomplices to various terms from six months to three years, and remarks that the addition of a sound flogging would not have been out of place.

A complaint against the commanding officers of one or two Bombay regiments.

39. The Pandit (159), in its issue of the 26th April, says:—A fortnight ago we received intimation from the Native officers of one or two regiments of the Bombay army that their commanding officers have compelled them to cease subscribing to the Pandit newspaper. This is certainly very strange. The Pandit is not a political paper; it invariably gives translations of general orders and other military matters most useful to Native officers and men of the Native army in enabling them to perform their duties properly. It is to be hoped that His Excellency the Governor and His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught will enquire into the subject and issue such orders as will remove hindrances now raised in the way of the charitable work of the Military Orphanage. In another place the Pandit writes:—The regimental Native officers mentioned above are willing to subscribe to our paper, but have been prohibited from doing so by their commandants, who have been misled by misrepresentations made to them by certain Native officers who owe subscriptions to us and have returned copies of some military books that were sent by us to them by post at their own request. Government does not object to charities, nor can it prohibit reading newspapers and works on military tactics.

Subhedár Jayachandra Thákar of the 44th Goorkha Light Infantry recommended for admission to the Order of British India.

40. The same newspaper says:—Subhedár Jayachandra Thákar of the 44th Goorkha Light Infantry has rendered valuable services to Government. He has performed the difficult work of recruiting with such success that the whole regiment consists of men recruited by him. Subhedár Jayachandra was present at the engagements with the enemy in the Khásiya and Jamtiya Hills and the Bhortan expeditions, and earned a clasp and medal. He also received a clasp in the Lushai expedition. It is to be hoped that Subhedár Jayachandra will, at the next distribution of the Order of British India, be admitted to the said order.

Disapproval of the proposed memorial in honour of Colonel Watson, late Political Agent, Káthiáwár, and a request to the Bombay Government.

41. The Hitechchhu (79) of Ahmedabad of the 25th April disapproves of the fund raised in memory of the late Colonel Watson, Political Agent, Káthiáwár, asks what good he has done to the people and the Native Princes of Káthiáwár save the Nágars in that province, hears that much pressure has been brought to bear upon the Rájás to contribute towards the fund, and requests the Government of His Excellency Lord Reay to enquire what Government servants subordinate to the Political Agency are on the committee appointed to collect subscriptions and whether they exert pressure upon the Rájás. The paper thinks the sums of money, varying from Rs. 50 to Rs. 150, contributed by some of the petty tálukdárs to have been paid involuntarily, and remarks that Government should at once stop such memorial funds and specially this fund which the public regard as got up in direct contravention of the Government orders on the subject. [The Rájyabhakt (126) of the 23rd April also calls the attention of the Bombay Government to the complaint and hopes that they will speedily remedy it.]

Alleged misleading official statement in connection with the Surat fires.

42. The Káthiáwár Times (81), in its issue of the 24th April, writes:—In the columns of the Times of India a Surat citizen contradicts the official statement which puts down the number of houses burnt in the recent fires at Surat at 1,251. The writer says that no less than 3,322 houses have been gutted. If the latter statement is correct the public should certainly like to know why such a grossly misleading official statement was submitted to Government and who submitted it. After this the public must certainly be very chary in regarding official statements as correct. By the submission of bogus statements Government and the public are alike misled; and it is to be hoped that Government will take steps to stop this very questionable practice. The matter calls for a prompt inquiry.

Race-feeling alleged to be on the increase in Bombay.

43. The Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 18th April, says that race-feeling has considerably increased in Bombay and points out two recent instances. Dr. Cawasji Hormasji recently took occasion to observe in the University Senate that the Pársis would withhold their aid from public instruction if the introduction of the vernaculars in the University curriculum were insisted upon. The other instance occurred in the Municipal Corporation. In the debate that took place on the occasion of appointing a chairman of the Standing Committee of the Municipal Corporation, this same gentleman observed that Bombay owes everything to the Pársis and therefore the appointment of a Pársi chairman would be an act of recognition of this fact. The paper is willing to give credit to the Pársis for the virtues they possess, but strongly deprecates the spirit in which the remark is made.

The Elephanta Caves, Bombay, and a suggestion in connection with the idols there.

44. The Satyavakta (129), in its issue of the 26th April, points out the necessity for the old and ruined Hindu temples, wells, &c., being repaired by well-to-do Hindus, complains of some Europeans and others sitting and riding upon some idols in the ruined temples, such as in the Elephanta Caves, Bombay, and otherwise insulting them, and suggests that generous Hindu Shethiás should employ Bráhmans in the Elephanta Caves for worshipping and taking care of the idols and that they should ask Government to make some arrangements by which non-Hindu visitors shall be prohibited from approaching them.

Visit of an armed gang of about 5,000 men to Dákor and the necessity for depriving them of arms.

45. In a news-letter from Dákor, the Satyavakta (129) of the 26th April refers to a gang of about 5,000 men armed with swords, clubs, axes, and bows and arrows fishing in the Gomati Tank in that town on the night of the 17th April and to some of them having divested a young man, aged 16, of all his ornaments and clothes and to his escape from being murdered by them, complains of no measures having been taken to check them, says that the gang consisted of the Dhárálás, the Mahomedans, the Vághris and others residing within a radius of about 12 kos of Dákor, and requests Government to deprive these people of arms, which they keep in contravention of the law, and to bring them to their senses.

The forest laws in the Panch Maháls and the Bhils.

46. The Satyodayă (130) of Dohad, in its issue of the 25th April, complains of the severity of the forest laws, and says that the Bhils in the Panch Maháls, who are a poor class of people, depend for their maintenance upon the sale of forest products in times of distress, that a large number of them die of starvation in times of scarcity and famine owing to the prohibition against their carrying and selling forest products, and that Government ought to relax the severity of the forest laws for their benefit.

Starvation among the poor people in the Dohad sub-division of the Panch Maháls.

47. In its local columns, the same newspaper says that the poor people residing in the villages are starving, that they flock in the mornings for getting work, and that they labour all day long for two or three pice.

Complaint against the Nadiád police.

48. The Svădesh Bandhu (136), in its issue of the 17th April, refers to the prevalence of thefts in Nadiád, complains of the carelessness of the local police in the matter, and remarks that some people say that some police officers have a hand in it and that it is necessary that Government should attend to the subject. In another place the paper complains of the encroachments made by some people upon the public streets in Nadiád, says that neither the police nor the police patel stop them, and asks whether they help the people in encroaching upon public land.

PART II.—Legislation.

The Bombay Village Sanitation Bill and Dr. Hewlett's letter concerning it.

49. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 21st April, writes:—On the whole we think that Dr. Hewlett's letter admirably fulfils the object in pointing out the weak spots in the Bombay Village Sanitation Bill, and Government and the public are alike concerned in taking note of what he says and avoiding the pitfalls he points out. On behalf of the village population of this presidency we beg to thank Dr. Hewlett for this evidence of his desire to "be true to the people among whom the best years of his life were spent and for whom he had the privilege of working so long, but who are unable to speak for themselves." It is very rarely that we see retired Anglo-Indians evincing such interest in the people of India.

50. With reference to Dr. Hewlett's strictures on the Bombay Village Sanitation Bill, the Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 22nd April, says:— The Bill, as it is, is unnecessarily long and is drafted by one who had little knowledge of village life, and if passed into law would bring with it new taxes and annoyance. Dr. Hewlett strongly opposes the measure, but it is not so bad as he tries to make it out and may be so improved as to suit the rural population. All the suggestions made by the doctor are not appropriate, but there are some among them that may be adopted with advantage, and it is to be hoped that the select committee on the Bill will adopt them. What is needed for village sanitation is an officer well-versed in sanitary matters, who should visit every village once a fortnight, pointing out to the villagers, in kind words, the necessity for removing to a distant place dirt and sweepings lying in the neighbourhood of private residences and on the public roads, and impressing on the minds of the rural population the desirability of not fouling drinking water by washing clothes in it or by other means. The patel or the village headman should be entrusted with the work of seeing that wells and streams are not fouled, and in this work he should be assisted by two villagers elected by the village population periodically. At periodical surveys of the state and progress of village sanitation, rewards may be given to those villages that have preserved sanitation in the best possible way. Once or twice a year lists should be published of villages in sad need of wells, in order that charitable persons may come forward to provide them.

51. The Shri Shiváji (60), in its issue of the 19th April, expresses approval of Dr. Hewlett's letter on the Bombay Village Sanitation Bill in general and in particular of his observation as to the excessive powers proposed to be vested by the Act in the District Collector. His remark that in all matters affecting the sanitation of Indian villages the Sanitary Department is the proper body to be consulted and that all rules and regulations in respect of any particular sanitary measure should emanate from or should be approved by that body, is, says the paper, quite in consonance with its own views on the matter. The paper expresses the hope that the Bill will be altered in the light of the criticism that has been made by the newspapers of the presidency and by the late Sanitary Commissioner, Dr. Hewlett.

PART III.—Education.

Necessity for reforming the Rájkumár College, Rájkot.

52. The Rájyabhakt (126), in its issue of the 23rd April, once more writes about the necessity for reforming the Rájkumár College, Rájkot, says that the Princes educated in it are given to flattery and intrigues and are irreligious and incompetent, that the Principal is also given to intrigues, that it is a question whether the students understand Mr. Whitworth's Law Lecture Book taught them and whether the assistant teachers, who are merely under-graduates and do not know law, are able to teach the subject, that it would be better to teach a few subjects thoroughly than to give an imperfect knowledge of many of them, that the services of many of those private tutors who have been forced upon the Princes should be done away with, and that the students should have opportunities to mix with the learned world outside the College.

PART IV.—Railways.

Inconvenience caused to the people by the mail train from Sukkur to Karáchi not stopping at Phulji.

53. The Muin-ul-Islám (163), in its issue of the 12th April, writes:— It is to be regretted that the mail train from Sukkur to Karáchi should not stop at the Phulji station, by which all the inward and outward post of the Naushahro Division is now brought and despatched. The Deputy Collector, the Subordinate Judge and the Mukhtyárkar whose head-quarters are at Naushahro as well as all other persons having occasion to travel by rail between Karáchi and Sukkur go viá Phulji, and if the mail train does not stop there, serious inconvenience will be felt. We hope that the authorities will see to this. [The Sind Sudhár (164), in its issue of the 20th April, expresses similar sentiments.]

Passenger train service between Sukkur and Jacobabad.

54. A correspondent of the Sind Sudhár (164), in its issue of the 13th April, writes:—The completion of the Sukkur Bridge, instead of promoting the convenience of the people, has become a source of inconvenience to them. Only two trains now run between Sukkur and Quetta instead of three. The time of the departure of both these trains is very inconvenient to persons travelling between Jacobabad and Sukkur. We therefore hope that the Traffic Manager will be pleased to run a third train between Sukkur and Jacobabad as before.

Unsatisfactory arrangements on the Bhávnagar-Gondal Railway line.

55. The Káthiáwár Times (81), in its issue of the 24th April, writes:—The general arrangements on the Bhávnagar-Gondal-Junágad-Porbandar Railway line are not yet satisfactory, for complaints have reached us that the railway authorities were quite inadequate to cope with the large influx of pilgrims who attended the Gir fair. Hundreds of passengers were seated in waggons, the carriages were overcrowded, and a lot of pilgrims who had paid for their passages could obtain no accommodation at all. The last were the greatest sufferers, for they had to wait till the next day whilst their families went ahead.

PART V.—Municipalities.

Enormous law expenses incurred by the Bombay Municipality in simple cases.

56. The Din Bandhu (7), in its issue of the 21st April, writes:—The municipal reign of terror in Bombay, which had ceased during the régime of Mr. Crawley-Boevey, seems to have recommenced. On Friday before last the municipality prosecuted one Kishandás Márwádi before Mr. Cooper for neglecting to fill in a form giving information as to certain landed property of a Mahárája which he managed. The accused protested that the form had been duly presented by his servant, which the ward clerk denied. The accused, it appears, was prepared to hand in a fresh form completed as required, and it was also clear that he had no intention to defraud the municipality as the property was already in the assessment books and the information required was a mere matter of routine. Municipal prestige and municipal reputation for the observance of legal forms must however be vindicated and the Municipal Solicitor must be given some employment, and the complaint was accordingly lodged against the ill-fated Kishandás under Sections 155 and 473 of the new Municipal Act. It was fortunate that the Magistrate took a just view of the case and acted on the principle that persuasion and compromise rather than coercion should guide the municipal authorities and dismissed the case, holding that he had no reason to doubt the word of the accused. The only parties that have benefited in this transaction are the lawyers. This is how the ratepayers' money is frittered away and how the ratepayers are dragged in the Police Courts on frivolous grounds. In a recent issue we spoke of the great powers vested in the Municipal Commissioner, and expressed a hope that this power would be wielded mercifully. The outlook is, however, far from hopeful, unless our Magistrates use greater discrimination and restrain within bounds the destructive zeal of municipal officials. Will the Bombay Ratepayers' Association and our new corporators look to these matters, and inquire who is responsible for sanctioning law expenses in simple cases of this kind which an intelligent municipal chaprási should be able to conduct with ease?

The Bombay Municipality and the segregation of lepers.

57. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 17th April, writes:—In these days of hurry and bustle nothing can be done without making a great deal of noise. The movement in the Bombay Municipality to segregate lepers is essentially a sensational movement. The existing evil may be one of very large proportions and is possibly urgently calling for a remedy. If Mr.

Kirkham wanted to signalise his re-entrance into the municipality by a display of energy and public spirit he has succeeded to perfection. When the tongues of the commissioners were once loosened there was no end to the stories that many had to tell. There were so many that knew so much about the lepers that the wonder seemed to be that nothing had been said about the matter up to the present time. In exciting loathing and horror we hope the Bombay public and the press will not overlook the sympathy due to afflicted humanity. Reduce the present danger of contamination by all means, segregate the lepers, make their existence less unbearable if you can, ask the Government to strengthen your hands by legislation, but do not let the horror and loathing against those unfortunate creatures grow. As it is, they are sufficiently miserable and are often led to put an end to their existence. If they are a danger to the healthy population, they should be segregated with all possible kindness and sympathy.

The recent municipal elections at Poona and the corruption that prevailed there.

58. Alluding to the corruption in the recent Poona municipal elections, the Shri Shiváji (60), in its issue of the 19th April, says:—Government should punish the guilty parties or those suspected by taking away from them their right of voting. They should be debarred from giving votes or standing as candidates for election. Such a punishment will be a deterrent one and will nip the evil in the bud. We must also inform Government that in the recent elections a prominent part was played by idle gossips and newsmongers. Consequently Government should be very cautious in inferring guilt where probably it may not exist. Of course Government has a perfect right to make all necessary inquiries in the matter, and we support it with all our best wishes in its endeavours to purify the city of Poona.

Validity of the election of Mr. Harji Hira as a municipal commissioner of Dholka questioned.

59. A correspondent writes to the Praja Mat (124) of the 20th April to complain of the election as a municipal commissioner, Dholka, of Mr. Harji Hira on the ground of his not being a duly qualified voter, says that his name was added in the list of voters after it was printed though the wheel-tax paid by him was on behalf of his sister Bái Náthi, and draws the attention of the municipal president to the matter.

Cholera in Broach and the khálkuwa system in that town.

60. The Rást Goftár (82), in its issue of the 21st April, attributes the prevalence of cholera in Broach for the last eighteen months to the system of khálkuwás (underground cess-pools) which the local municipality has forced upon the town, says that it has been resolved to stop this system in Surat and Ahmedabad on the ground of its being injurious to public health, and remarks that it is surprising that the Broach Municipality should have forcibly adopted this objectionable system when it is being given up in Surat. [The Broach Samáchár (93), in its issue of the 25th April, takes the same view and advises the local municipality to have no more new khálkuwás.]

PART VI.—Native States.

Mismanagement in the Sávantvádi State and the case of Náráyan Govind Sarvate alias Dattadás charged with treason.

61. The Poona Vaibhav (48), in its issue of the 21st April, says that the State of Sávantvádi is not properly managed and that great injustice in some shape or other is being done there. It refers to the case of one Náráyan Sarvate alias Dattadás who was charged with treasonable practices and is now in jail, and remarks:—Great injustice is done to the poor man who was simply a preacher and a respectable man. He was sent to jail because the officials of the State did not like his exposure of their misdeeds. We draw the attention of Government to his case and hope that they will call for the papers in connection with it and review it. From the information we have received, we come to the conclusion that Dattadás Báwa has been the victim of the oppressive set of officials who now guide the State. Appeals have been preferred by the Báwa and his friends, but no satisfactory reply has been given by the Divisional Commissioner. The fair name of Government would be stained, if they were to let a poor and harmless man lie in jail on trumped up charges of treason. Government should immediately make inquiries in this case, in which an amount of injustice has been done.

Intrigue in Dhrángadra and a request to the Bombay Government to enquire into it.

62. The Káthiáwár Times (81), in its issue of the 21st April, writes :—We understand that owing to some infamous khatpat at Dhrángadra the heir-apparent to the gádi, Kumár Shri Ajitsingji, now studying in the Rájkumár College, refuses to return to his home. Ajitsingji is an orphan and is the grandson of the Rája Sáheb. He has been recently led to believe, not without, it is said, some reason, that if he were to return to Dhrángadra certain parties would make short work of him. Ajitsingji, who is only about 16 or 17 years of age and who is, by the bye, a very good, docile and promising Prince, is naturally very much frightened. About a week before the death of Colonel Watson Ajitsingji saw him and laid his case before him. The late Political Agent, who knew Káthiáwár khatpat very well, assured Ajitsingji that no harm would come to him, and that he would investigate the whole matter and help him to the best of his power. He enjoined him not to be frightened at all. Colonel Watson is dead, and Ajitsingji's fate appears to be uncertain. Ajitsingji's tutor, who is known to be a good man and who is very much attached to him, not relishing the conduct of certain parties towards the Prince offered to resign—nay, we are told, sent in his resignation, but on some ground or other it has not been accepted. Ajitsingji's helplessness having come to the notice of the Rájkot Thákor Sáheb, he specially came down from Sardhar to see the Prince and kindly assured him of his help. He asked Mr. Macnaghten, Principal of the College, to allow him an interview with Ajitsingji in Mr. Macnaghten's presence. Mr. Macnaghten, however, is said to have refused it, saying that permission cannot be granted without the order of the Political Agent. The Thákor Sáheb saw Colonel Hancock, but the result of the interview is not known. If all this be true, we are decidedly of opinion that prompt inquiry should be made into the Dhrángadra State matters. If Ajitsingji does not wish to go to Dhrángadra, he must not be compelled to go. [The Ahmedabad Times (85), in its issue of the 23rd April, also requests Government to enquire into the matter.]

Complaints against Captain Kennedy, Acting 3rd Assistant to the Political Agent, Káthiáwár.

63. The Rájyabhakt (126), in its issue of the 23rd April, refers to a case in which Lakhmanwála, a part-proprietor in Jetpur, married the wife of a Cháraniya, who thereupon preferred charges of abduction, bigamy during the life-time of her husband, &c., before Captain Kennedy, Assistant to the Political Agent, Káthiáwár, to his failure to get justice from Captain Kennedy who is a friend of Lakhmanwála, and to the Cháraniya having passed a deed relinquishing his claims on his wife on payment of money by Lakhmanwála, and asks whether Captain Kennedy cannot be charged with abetting the offence when he has allowed this slavery to pass unnoticed. The Captain, observes the paper, passes much of his time in Jetpur, and if he had not illegally shown undue favour the woman in question could not have married Lakhmanwála. It is surprising that the Political Agency, Káthiáwár, should connive at a husband selling his wife to a friend of the Assistant Political Agent and that the Bombay Government should also follow the same course. This connivance on the part of the officer in question must be due to some great profit derived by him. It is desirable that the Bombay Government should speedily enquire into the subject and publish the result. In another article the same paper complains of Prince Káláwála of Luni, a petty táluka at a short distance from Jetpur, being not yet invested with the management of the táluka, asks whether Captain Kennedy has not acted illegally in withholding the management from the Prince, says that Mr. Hira Devji, the present Manager of the táluka appointed by Government, has exercised much severity upon the Prince on the occasion of his wedding, thinks that the withholding of the management from the Prince is perhaps due to the machinations of Mr. Hira Devji, and adds that it is necessary that Government should speedily enquire into the prevalence of bribery, corruption, injustice and other evils in Káthiáwár.

The people and the Native States of Káthiáwár and a petition prepared by the editor and proprietor of the Rájyabhakt newspaper for presentation to His Excellency Lord Reay on their behalf.

64. The same newspaper gives a further instalment of the petition prepared by its editor and proprietor for presentation to His Excellency Lord Reay on behalf of the people and Native Princes of Káthiáwár, in which it says that the condition of all the first-class Princes in the province is pitiful, that the Kárbháris harass the Princes and their subjects and are backed up by the Political Agent, that they use the State money for the benefit of themselves and their friends and relatives, and that the state of second-class Princes can thereby be easily imagined. The paper dwells on the necessity for reforming the Pálitána State, and remarks that the people thereof are not happy, that the State debt has increased, that His Highness the Thákor is powerless and that intrigues prevail in the State. It then takes in hand the Wadhwán State, complains of the injustice done to and oppression practised upon the Wadhwán Mahájan (trading community) by the Thákor and his Kárbhári, cites instances in support of its complaint, and adds that nearly one hundred families have left Wadhwán.

The decision of the Secretary of State for India in the Crawford case criticized.

The Vaidarbh (2), in its issue of the 20th April, writes:—We cannot say that the decision of the Secretary of State for India has come as a surprise upon us. Indeed what had been permitted to leak out about the opinion of the Commission had prepared most men for a verdict like that just given; and the misgivings which were then entertained have now been justified. It must be stated frankly that to all those who took a dispassionate and unbiassed view of the proceedings against Mr. Crawford and carefully noted the progress of the case, the acquittal of Mr. Crawford on the charges of corruption must appear eminently unsatisfactory. Like the Government of Bombay we are unable to accept the finding of the Commissioners that Mr. Crawford is not guilty on the charges of corruption, as we believe along with His Excellency Lord Reay and his Council, that the evidence established beyond all reasonable doubt that Mr. Crawford did accept illegal gratification for showing favour or forbearing to show disfavour in the exercise of his official functions. Indeed, reading carefully the despatch of the Secretary of State it would appear that Lord Cross himself entertains some doubt about the correctness of the finding arrived at by the Commissioners and that it is merely his respect for them which prevents him from throwing their finding overboard. The punishment awarded to Mr. Crawford is heavy enough. We for one were never anxious to see him put in jail. It is impossible not to feel for a man of his splendid abilities and insinuating manners in the moment of his fall. But what we do say is that we cannot consistently with justice acquit him of corruption, and that too on the evidence brought against him. He may be pardoned because he has rendered great services, but he cannot be held guiltless.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Part I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Contemplated re-establishment of the Famine Insurance Fund.

1. In noticing the telegram from Allahabad that, on a consideration of the report on the economic condition of the people of India, the India Office has arrived at the conclusion that the Famine Insurance Fund might be re-established when the financial position admits of this course, the Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 2nd May, says:—Does this intimation mean that the Famine Insurance Fund is to be revived by the repayment of the money of this fund that has been expended? This, however, cannot be, since the financial situation of the country is worse than what it was when the fund was diverted to other purposes. Is then a new tax to be imposed to revive the fund? This also is impossible, since the burden of the existing taxes has grown so unbearable as to make further addition to it out of the question. Looking at the ever-increasing expenditure of the country and complications in the administration, there is little chance of the financial position improving at an early date so as to admit of the re-establishment of the Famine Insurance Fund. There is also no probability of the removal of the anxiety displayed by the public on account of the abolition of this fund by such empty assurance as the India Office has conveyed.

The question of infant marriages among the Hindus in Parliament.

2. The Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 4th May, says:—The reply of Sir John Gorst to a question asked in the House of Commons, that the Government of India would continue to make every attempt to discourage infant marriages in India without breaking the promise given to the Natives to respect their social custom, was very discreet and conveyed a fresh assurance that Government would not interfere with the social customs of the country without sufficient cause. Sir John's reply will not be liked by such Natives as desire that the Indian social progress should be accelerated by all means, but will be highly acceptable to the country. [The Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the same date, expresses similar sentiments.]

Dhuleep Sing's letter to Her Majesty the Queen insisting upon the restoration to him of the Koh-i-Noor disapproved.

3. In alluding to the insulting letter written by Dhuleep Sing to Her Majesty the Queen, demanding the restoration to him of the Koh-i-Noor, the Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 30th April, says:—Leaving aside the question whether any injustice has been done by the British Government to the Mahárája, there is not the least doubt that the conduct of the latter for the last four years, in trying to raise sedition against that Government, has been highly derogatory to his high position, and has deprived him of the sympathy that was entertained for him by a few Natives of the Panjáb. Whatever may be the moral aspect of the conduct of Lord Dalhousie in deposing Dhuleep Sing and annexing his ráj to the British territories, the Mahárája never before this seemed dissatisfied with his condition, while, on the other hand, he lived in England in ease and comfort, without ever giving a thought to India or even his countrymen in the Panjáb. Dhuleep Sing renounced his ancestral religion and embraced Christianity, marrying a Christian lady; he never mixed with the Indians in England, nor does he seem to have ever made enquiries of them about the condition of India. When the Mahárája found that the British Government refused to supply him with more means for commanding further comforts and pleasures, he renounced Christianity, re-embraced Sikhism, and began making advances to the Sikhs in the Panjáb. This conduct of Dhuleep Sing is looked upon with disdain by the people of India, including those of the Panjáb, who believe it to be the result of insanity. Under such circumstances it is to be hoped that the Mahárája will seek pardon of the British Government for the insults given by him, and that the latter will graciously take him again under their protection. [The Akhbáre Sodágar (87), in its issue of the same date, expresses similar sentiments. The Gujarát Gazette (76), in its issue of the 2nd May, writes:—The manifesto or rather the impudent and mad demand of the Koh-i-Noor in the shape of a characteristic letter by Dhuleep Sing makes us believe that his animosity will end in madness. The letter published by Dhuleep Sing in the Daily Telegraph plainly shows that his scheme of raising so many millions sterling for storming India was a dream and a true raving of a true candidate for Bedlam. A few other papers also disapprove of Dhuleep Sing's insolent demand of the Koh-i-Noor and say that he has gone mad.]

Mr. Maclean's views on the Indian National Congress and education to the natives of India strongly disapproved.

4. The Káthiáwár Times (81), in its issue of the 1st May, writes:—"There is something in the salt of India which makes people ungrateful." Such was the remark passed by a contemporary sometime ago; and we find that the observation is too true. Mr. J. M. Maclean, the late editor of the Bombay Gazette, who prides himself in being a M. P., and who often pretended whilst in India, perhaps to secure a large circulation of his newspaper, to be one of her best friends, now declares that England holds India for her own interests and not for the benefit of India; and that it is education which has brought the Indian Government and the English people in general to the present discreditable state of affairs. Mr. Maclean thinks that because he is a M. P. his opinion carries immense weight. No body cares two straws for such gratuitous and obtrusive opinions, and Mr. Maclean might do no better than keep his observations to himself. If journalists would leave such apostates alone they would soon sink into insignificance. To reply to them is simply playing their game, as chopping arguments with such men gives them a sort of fictitious importance. [A few other papers also express strong disapproval of the views expressed by Mr. Maclean in his contribution to the Asiatic Quarterly Review on the subject.]

The alleged intention of the leaders of the Bombay Branch of the Indian National Congress to ask the Bombay Government to lend the Government House, Parel, for the meeting place of the next Congress disapproved.

5. In noticing the report that the leaders of the Bombay Branch of the Indian National Congress intend asking the Government of Bombay to place the Government House, Parel, and the unoccupied grounds therein at the disposal of the Congress to serve as the meeting place of the next Congress, the Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 4th May, says:—It does not appear likely that the Congress will secure the building. Most of the European officials in India entertain a strong dislike for the Congress, and raise as many impediments as they can in its work. The Government of the North-West Provinces not only refused to lend the Government House at Allahabad for the last year's meeting, but tried to dissuade private parties from giving their buildings. The Bombay Government might not go so far and might give a fitting reception to the delegates as did Lord Dufferin at Calcutta in 1886 and Lord Connemara at Madras in 1887, but that does not mean that they would lend the Government House at Parel. Recently the Government of India issued orders that Government officials should keep themselves aloof from raising subscriptions, &c., for public associations, and the object of this order seems to be to keep the Government officials at a distance from the Congress. The leaders of the Congress had better not ask the Bombay Government to lend the Government House, Parel, and place the authorities and themselves in an awkward position.

The minute of Sir R. West on the Crawford case criticised.

6. The Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 2nd May, writes:—It is indeed a very remarkable fact that two eminent authorities, such as the "very strong" Crawford Commission and the Bombay Government under the advice of their distinguished Judicial Member of Council should have arrived at diametrically opposite conclusions on the examination of one and the same evidence. We are afraid that Sir R. West in forming his conclusions very probably proceeded on a different assumption altogether, viz., that the guilt of an accused officer, more especially if he be a distinguished officer, must be presumed until his innocence was proved. We do not know whether the integrity and purity of the public service require the application of such an unnatural principle as the one set forth above; perhaps there may be those who hold that an accused officer is under obligation of directly proving his innocence, and that such an obligation is the greater in the case of a distinguished officer if he should happen to be impeached. But with all deference we must decline to subscribe to such an unnatural principle. The first reflection that suggests itself very strongly after the perusal of Sir R. West's minute is that if the Bombay Government after the consideration of the evidence recorded in no less than twenty-four cases had arrived at a conclusion entirely different from that which the Commissioners arrived at, they should have availed themselves of the power reserved to them under Section 22 of Act 37 of 1850 and should have submitted the proceedings before the Commission for the opinion of the Bombay High Court. The aforesaid section lays down that "when special Commissioners have been appointed, the Government may also, if it thinks fit, refer the report of the Commissioners to the Court, or other authority to which the person accused is subordinate, for their opinion on the case, and will finally pass such orders thereon as appear just and consistent with its powers in such cases." At the outset of paragraph 98 of his minute Sir R. West on behalf of the Bombay Government expresses their regret at their having been deprived of the moral support, which a concurrence of the Commission in what is alleged to be the right decision of the case, would have doubtless extended to the foresaid decision arrived at by the Bombay Government, but of which they were deprived owing to the alleged wrong method and standards pursued by the Commission in appreciating the evidence adduced and also owing to the alleged ignorance of the three Commissioners from Northern India of the administrative system in the Bombay Presidency, and their alleged unacquaintance with the type of character of Native witnesses. The Bombay Government, however, had another alternative open to them which they might have tried in their endeavour to secure that moral support of which they, according to their own admission, obviously stood in great need. A reference to the Bombay High Court under Section 22 of the said Act would have enabled Government to test the soundness or otherwise of the method pursued by the Commission, and would, moreover, have supplied the alleged defects in the Commission, viz., their assumed ignorance of the administrative system in the Bombay Presidency and their alleged unacquaintance with the type of character of native witnesses; for the Bombay High Court cannot be charged with want of intimate knowledge of these two matters, granting that such intimate knowledge was essential to the proper adjudication of the simple issues involved. If such acquaintance was so necessary a qualification it is really a matter for surprise that the Bombay Government declined to accept the Government of India's nomination of the Honourable Mr. Justice Bayley as President of the Commission, and that they saw no objection whatever at the starting to the Honourable Mr. Justice Wilson being President. There is also another reflection which in this very connection forces itself on the mind of an impartial critic of the recent proceedings at Poona,—a critic not blinded by local prejudice, called in current ordinary parlance, "local knowledge,"—viz., how Mr. Ommanney and Mr. Baines, the two officers in charge of the prosecution, and Mr. Vidal, the District Magistrate, with their acknowledged acquaintance with the administrative system in Bombay did not see that the theory, on the strength of which "unscrupulous" Pendse undertook to prove to demonstration Mr. Arthur Crawford's appointments, promotions and transfers of Mámlatdárs to be irregular in the extreme and therefore made presumably from corrupt motives, was fiction pure and simple, as subsequently admitted by the Advocate-General and now by Sir R. West himself. It may be that Pendse is only "self-opinionative" and intellectually defective, and not "unscrupulous," but we cannot understand how the three officers mentioned above, the last of whom is a pucca Collector and the two former senior enough to be pucca Collectors at an early date, failed to perceive the hollowness of that theory, when none of them can, like the three Commissioners from Northern India, be said to have been unacquainted with the administrative system in Bombay. We have a strong suspicion that the attempt to derive adventitious support from such a theory contributed very largely to the utter collapse of the prosecution and that it must have given the Commissioners an idea of there having been a conspiracy to ruin Mr. Arthur Crawford. And when it is borne in mind that, long before the break-down of Pendse under the skilful cross-examination by Mr. Inverarity, the three Commissioners who, we are told, laboured under the disadvantage of the alleged unacquaintance with the administrative system in Bombay, clearly saw what others, professedly not labouring under such disadvantage, had failed to perceive, that is the utter worthlessness of the theory, is it not really surprising to find the Bombay Government making a fruitless effort to discredit the Commissioners' conclusions on the ground of their alleged unacquaintance with the administrative system in Bombay? For all these reasons we are inclined to think that the Bombay Government would have been better advised, if before venturing to dissent from the conclusions arrived at by the Commission they had referred the proceedings and the report to the Bombay High Court for their opinion. Act 37 of 1850 appears to have been carefully framed with the special object of preventing miscarriage of justice or the perpetration of injustice, and also with the object of avoiding as far as possible, the unseemly spectacle, presented to the public view in the present case, of two different authorities arriving at diametrically opposite conclusions on the consideration of one and the same evidence. Even the Secretary of State for India did not venture to reject the verdict of the Commission and of the Bombay Government in the Cambay case without first consulting the highest judicial authority in the Empire and obtaining his concurrence in the view he himself took of that case.

Sir R. West's minute and the report of the Commission in the Crawford case compared and criticised.

7. The Sudhárak (17), in its issue of the 29th April, writes:—The masterly minute which Sir Raymond West has written in reveiwing the report of the Commissioners is, we will only say, worthy of one so learned, so conscientious and so fearless a man as Sir Raymond is. Oh! what a contrast do we behold when we place it side by side with the report of the Honourable Mr. Justice Wilson and his colleagues! In the one case we see all that is straightforward and just. There is no shuffling, no shrinking from hideous conclusions. A spade is there described as a spade. In the other case we perceive nothing but a practical brief held for Mr. Crawford. Whosoever gives testimony against this greatest of heaven-borns in this Presidency is 'unreliable.' His story is 'improbable.' It bears the evidence of improbability on its very face! Mr. Pendse is an unscrupulous man; Mr. Bhimbhái, an interested, or rather an injured, enemy. Mr. Crawford is as innocent as the babe just born, and the Mámlatdárs are fiends in human shape trying to make a scapegoat of poor Mr. Crawford. Or if you like, you might suppose Mr. Crawford to be the greatest gull in the country, and Hanmantráo and Kázi Abbás, two scoundrels imposing upon him and upon the silly public! No wonder then that public faith in the usefulness of such commissions or in their ability to arrive at impartial truth should receive a staggering blow.

8. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 28th April, writes:—No criticism upon the Crawford case would be complete without an examination of the able minute written by the Honourable Sir Raymond West on the report of the Commission. The Commissioners' report shows distinctly that they gave undue importance to the statements of Mr. Crawford, and that they imposed upon themselves unnecessary restrictions which excluded the consideration of evidence of great importance. The object of the Bombay Government in bringing the matter before a commission instead of taking it before a court of law was that the whole should be conducted in the shape of an inquiry and not in that of a technical trial. In a court of law Government could not have preferred more than three charges at a time and thus the effect of cumulative evidence which goes a great length in such matters would have been lost. But the Commissioners behaved in several respects as though they were presiding in a court of law and thereby defeated the primary object of bringing the case before them. The Honourable Sir Raymond West points out the mistake on these points very forcibly. Here then we see how the whole thing was judged from a wrong point of view and the result has been, at least as far as the Commission was concerned, an utter failure of justice. And we do not see why the Commission sat for so long a time, if it was to be held after all that nothing but Mr. Crawford's own declarations would be believed. If the Commissioners had in the very beginning declared that to be their leading standard of valuation of testimony, all trouble would have been saved and the proceedings would have been very much shortened. If they had such a high sense of Mr. Crawford's antecedents at the end of the trial, it was sure to have been in their mind at the beginning and a simple declaration to that effect would have been beneficial to both the parties.

9. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 28th April, writes:—The defects of the report have been so clearly pointed out by the learned Judicial Member of Government who combines a thorough practical knowledge of the Presidency with a long judicial experience on the District and the High Court Bench, that it is needless to go into the matter at any length. We will, therefore, only refer to one or two points as examples. Regarding the promises of indemnity given to witnesses, the Commissioners say—"Of course these inducements were offered solely with the view to make those to whom they were offered to speak the truth without fear. But such people as those in question are apt to put their own interpretation upon their undertaking to speak the truth and to treat it as an undertaking to speak what will support the charge against the accused." Sir Raymond West justly styles this "a purely gratuitous assumption" and observes,—"The chief witnesses who spoke on the promise of indemnity were men of good education and tolerably well-acquainted with the law. They could not misconstrue an encouragement to tell the truth into a temptation held out by Government to falsehood, and unless they imputed this baseness to the Government, and were themselves base enough to yield to it, how can they have supposed they were called on to give evidence that would tell against Mr. Crawford without regard to whether it was true or false?" This consideration indeed ought to be obvious. Then, Mr. Pendse is considered by the Commission to have been actively engaged in getting up the case against Mr. Crawford, whereas, as explained in the reply, he was only doing whatever work he was directed to do in connection with the matter and his only fault was hastiness. Next Mr. Crawford's expenditure, clearly beyond means, and his remittances to his bankers are held to be easily accounted for by his recourse to reckless borrowing. Even his attempted flight under disguise, which Sir Raymond views with not more than needful indignation, does not strike the Commissioners in the light it should. In short, the spirit of the assumption referred to above runs throughout the appreciation of the evidence on the case generally and little is taken as reliable except what the accused himself admitted in his chief or cross-examination. And thus the Commissioners have come to treat the Government and the witnesses as people bent on seeing Mr. Crawford convicted as private prosecutors are in ordinary criminal prosecutions; but in that case, as Sir R. West very pointedly observes, they should, to be consistent, have refused to his denials the weight due to the testimony of a disinterested witness. The result practically has been, as we have remarked in our last issue, that the Commissioners seem to have begged the main question a priori. They observe in the report that, though under his circumstances Mr. Crawford was under greater temptation to corruption than other embarrassed men, there must be a wide gulf in his mind, because of his high position and antecedents! This, we repeat, is under the circumstances of the case, simply begging the question, and, therefore, cannot help to a correct conclusion on the main issue in the case.

The report of the Commission in the Crawford case and the manner in which evidence was appreciated.

10. The same newspaper writes:—On the perusal of the papers in the Crawford case one cannot but be moved with the conviction that the report of the Commissioners as regards the charges of corruption is a lame document and so incorrect is their finding of the weight of evidence on that head that it has struck even a zealous partisan of the accused with amazement. This would appear to have resulted in part from their total want of acquaintance with the ways and institutions of the Bombay Presidency, but chiefly from their adopting wrong or defective principles or misapprehending the scope of the inquiry as has been well pointed out in Sir Raymond West's able and elaborate minute. What, however, ought to surprise the Commissioners themselves is the shrewdness and accuracy with which their decision was from their own casual remarks and behaviour foreshadowed by the public—the native public at any rate—of Bombay long before it was arrived at by themselves. In fact even before the inquiry was completed, people began freely to talk among themselves that the result so far as the Commissioners were concerned was exactly what it has actually turned out to be. Indeed, so wide spread was this then increditable belief that when at the close of the case the President observed that their opinion should not be taken to be on the one side or the other, we thought it needful to notice the matter and wrote in our issue of the 27th January last—"It was doubtless a relief to those, and their number was not small, who felt as if the Commission appointed to inquire into the charges on which Mr. Crawford had been suspended were determined to go against the Government of Bombay and of India to read the formal explanation made by the President before the inquiry closed." But as the actual result turns out, the explanation need not have been made and the Commissioners, whatever else they think of Bombay folks, must entertain a high idea of their power of thought-reading and prevision.

11. The Gujaráti (77), in its issue of the 28th April, writes:—Although we cannot this week review the exhaustive report of the Commissioners in the Crawford case and the still more forcible, logical and learned observations of Sir Raymond West, we cannot help saying that the Commissioners seem to have gone to their work in a conscientious spirit. But unfortunately they seem to have adopted principles of weighing evidence which cannot commend themselves even to laymen who are not versed in the fictions and technicalities of the common law of England. The logical conclusion of their verdict of not-guilty in respect of the graver charges is that each and every one of the witnesses—none of whom bore any ill-will against Mr. Crawford—are perjurers of the blackest dye and that even the Government lent their countenance to this unprecedented conspiracy, and we are glad Sir Raymond West has exposed the hollowness of the Commissioners' reasoning with such brilliant force and cogency of argument that one cannot help regretting that the Bombay High Court should have been deprived of the very valuable services of such an able and learned jurist by his elevation to a high post.

The decision of the Secretary of State for India in the Crawford case and a suggestion that some allowance or pension be given to Mrs. Crawford and children.

12. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 28th April, writes:—The communication to him of the Secretary of State's despatch was tantamount, we presume, to Mr. Crawford's formal removal from the service, without pension and certainly without any credit. Practically, therefore, the result of the trial is what the Government of Bombay arrived at long ago on being furnished with the report of the Commissioners. The accused has been held innocent of corrupt practices for want of direct evidence which is seldom or never forthcoming in such cases. We are not sorry he has been given the benefit of a doubt so far, though for those who have read the Government of Bombay's letter to the Secretary of State, and Sir Raymond West's minute particularly, there can be only one presumption on this count. However, we are not sorry at what has happened, nor have we ever found the Local Government pressing the charge too hard, their object having been only to shift the matter to the bottom and to show to the public that the highest officer of the State is as amenable to the laws of the land and the rules of the service as the meanest of Her Majesty's subjects or servants. This object has been amply gained, and we may leave it to the future historian to decide between the conclusions of Mr. Crawford's own peers, arrived at after a necessarily restricted and partial inquiry, and those of his employers who have had far better opportunities of judging of the extent of his delinquencies. We feel for him as much as the best of his friends possibly could. But he has drifted into this position with his eyes open, and he can hardly be surprised at it now. His fall has been great in proportion to the height to which he had attained. Nothing remains for him now but to profit by the lesson, and to make a fresh start, if he can. This is not impossible with his talents. We feel much more for his unfortunate family. Is it necessary that the victims of his reckless irregularities should suffer with him to the same extent? Mr. Crawford cannot have a pension, but we think his wife and children may have some compassionate allowance from his contributions to the Pension Fund. We doubt if the Government of Bombay can consistently recommend such a course. But it seems to be open to the Secretary of State for India to do so. Better still, perhaps the Pension Committee, or whatever that body is called, may settle the matter independently. We have been told of at least one precedent, in Madras, of such a semi-official arrangement. As the allowance we suggest will not be made at the expense of the tax-payers, it may be made with better grace. As to the Mámlatdárs, the best plan, as we submitted about a month ago, will be to divide them into groups according to the degree of their offence. Some will have to be dismissed, others to be transferred to different departments, and some others will, we believe, have to be compensated. Those who have been victims more than offenders need considerate treatment. Government will doubtless find it very difficult to deal with the men one by one; and this difficulty will be aggravated by the number of the delinquents and their varying offences. But the difficulty and the expense must be faced rather than the plighted word of the Government be vitiated in any sense or to any degree. [The Samsher Báhádur (127) of the 26th and the Praja Mat (124) of the 27th April, and the Pársi Tikákár (123) of the 1st and the Broach Samáchár (93) of the 2nd May pronounce the punishment meted out to Mr. Crawford to be severe. The Samsher Báhádur remarks that Mr. Crawford should have been given a part, if not the whole, of his pension, that he has been reduced to beggary owing to the heavy costs incurred by him in defending himself and the loss of pension, and that it would be better if Lord Cross were to have the question of pension reconsidered in Parliament. The Broach Samáchár observes that Government should show mercy to Mr. Crawford and give him some compensation in recognition of his long and valuable services, and that such a step would prove a boon to him in his present condition.]

The decision of the Secretary of State for India in the Crawford case.

13. The same newspaper writes:—There is no doubt the Commissioners brought to the performance of their tedious and disagreeable task much patience and industry. There is, too, no question of their conscientious desire to arrive at the truth. But sad want of acquaintance with the people and the institutions of this Presidency, and misapprehension of the scope of their labours, as already observed, have evidently led them to the conclusion they have arrived at. The Secretary of State for India has, no doubt, formally left their finding undisturbed, but he has also clearly indicated his internal concurrence in the conclusion come to by the Government of Bombay on the merits of the case; and as his Lordship has passed an order which, all things considered, satisfies public conscience though not to the full extent, and has fully vindicated the public-spirited action of the Government of His Excellency Lord Reay even when it was assailed with such malignant persistence in the public press, the painful and difficult case may be said to have ended as satisfactorily as it was possible, considering the difficulties in the way, and the sooner it is forgotten, except in its stern moral lessons, the better for all parties.

14. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 29th April, writes:—It is to be regretted that the many considerations put forth by Sir Raymond West for not accepting the Commissioners' opinion and for arriving at an opposite conclusion did not carry the weight they eminently deserved with the Secretary of State. Lord Cross laboured under the same difficulties of ignorance of local conditions and prejudice against the Native witnesses caused by the prevailing, but utterly baseless, notion about their untrustworthiness, and perhaps enhanced in the present instance by the outcry raised by Mr. Crawford's supporters. This outcry against the witnesses, as well as the strong view taken by the Commissioners in favour of the accused probably caused a doubt in Lord Cross's mind, and his Lordship seems to have given the benefit of the doubt to the accused, without weighing the probabilities of the case with any nicety. In thus dealing with the case in an off-hand manner his Lordship has cast an unmerited slur on the character of a large body of public servants, who were invited by the Local Government to speak the truth and who, the Government is satisfied, have spoken the truth. The punishment dealt out to Mr. Crawford will probably satisfy the end with which the proceedings were instituted, viz., the purging of the administration. But we cannot take the complacent view that the ends of justice have been satisfied by this decision. In our opinion nothing will compensate the infamy with which the character of a large number of respectable Native gentlemen has been branded. We should have preferred a lighter sentence with a conviction on the charges of corruption to the one now passed without the conviction.

15. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 28th April, writes:—The Secretary of State would have better used his discretion if he had set aside the conclusion of the Commission with regard to the charges of corruption. Any assistance that he wanted from local knowledge would have been afforded by the able, impartial and judicial minute of Sir Raymond West. However, he chose otherwise, and we must rest contented with his choice. We only mention this matter to indicate public feeling on this question. It is felt by all whose minds have not been warped by personal considerations that the Commission has been so far a failure, and that instead of doing any good it has done considerable harm.

16. The Sudhárak (17), in its issue of the 29th April, writes :—The time-serving argument of Lord Cross for not disturbing the conclusions of the Commissioners cannot help creating a feeling of indignation. If the preposterous doctrine were admitted that those who have not enjoyed the opportunity of personally seeing and hearing the witnesses should not reconsider the decisions of those who have, all appeals on points of facts would cease. But again where was this doctrine when this same Lord Cross was pleased to set aside the conclusions of the Commissioners in the Wilson case. There were infinitely stronger grounds in that case for not disturbing the decision of Messrs. Moore and Naylor than any that could have induced Lord Cross to forego his right of revision in the present case. But in that case the Commissioners had convicted a heaven-born, whereas in this they had acquitted one; and that explains all the difference in the treatment accorded to the two cases. However, now that Sir Raymond West's minute has been published, the conclusions of the Commissioners or the decision of Lord Cross not to overrule them will not mislead even the most ignorant about the real facts of the case.

17. The Bakul (22), in its issue of the 28th April, says :—We do not at all agree with those who say that the decision of the Secretary of State for India in the Crawford case is, considering all the circumstances of the case, satisfactory. The greatest fault which we find in the decision is that it countenances in an emphatic manner Mr. Macaulay's diction as to the veracity of the natives of this country. What good has Government derived from the appointment of a special commission to try Mr. Crawford? The Commissioners do not believe a particle of what witnesses like Pendse and others deposed before it. To the charge of indebtedness Mr. Crawford himself confesses and even if he had not confessed to that charge Government could have arrived at the truth by a departmental inquiry. The sentence which has been meted out to Mr. Crawford for his offence of borrowing is severe. There are many officers similarly situated. We cannot, therefore, say that Lord Cross has done justice in this case. If there had been a higher tribunal for appeal the present decision would surely have been reversed because in arriving at decisions in cases like Mr. Crawford's the claims of justice are not so much adhered to as those of individual opinion and authority.

Mr. Crawford's punishment considered not severe.

18. The Gujaráti (77), in its issue of the 21st April, writes :—It is said that Mr. Crawford's dismissal from the service is a cruelly hard punishment upon him and that it is necessary to appeal to the House of Commons from the decision of Lord Cross. We do not see any kind of undue severity or cruelty in the matter. We have already said that we thoroughly sympathise with Mr. Crawford in his heavy misfortune; but personal sympathies ought in such cases to be controlled and regulated by higher considerations. In the first place his position to-day is better than that of any Native in like circumstances. We have little doubt that the body of evidence that has been brought forward in support of the charge of corruption would have sufficed to send a Native to prison for a number of years. Is it not cruel that Hanmantráo should now be rotting in prison for doing things which he would never have done if his relations with Mr. Crawford had been otherwise? There are certain things which can never be conclusively proved in a court of law or before a commission insisting upon the strict application of the principles of evidence, but despite all that the Native community knows that certain abuses did exist and a hundred authoritative decisions will not convince it of the contrary. The late Hindu cashier in the Bombay Small Cause Court is now suffering rigorous imprisonment after thirty-seven years of honest Government service. Could not the Judge have dealt with him more leniently? Did not Kungen Menon, Deputy Collector of Tellicherry, die in prison while his appeal was being considered by the Privy Council? The evidence in that case was not very strong but the sentence was undoubtedly severe and his life in prison was certainly rendered miserable by the neglect of those humane considerations which make the life of a European more comfortable in his cell. In the second place the position occupied by Mr. Crawford was a very responsible one full of golden opportunities both for doing good or evil and in the interests of the purity and efficiency of the administration it is desirable that an officer who grossly abuses the trust placed in him should be dealt with in an exemplary manner.

Sir R. West's minute and the Mámlatdárs in the Crawford case.

19. The Sudhárak (17), in its issue of the 29th April, writes:—The Mámlatdárs will be sincerely grateful to Sir Raymond West for the strong attitude he has taken up in their favour. Sir Raymond puts his foot down and says that most of these men ought to be retained in their places, as they have shown by coming forward to confess their misdeeds and thus lay bare their shame to the gaze of the world, that their consciences are not after all so scared as one might have supposed. These men fell, because there were strong temptations. There is no reason to believe that they would wantonly walk out of the path of rectitude. There is infinite disgrace, says Sir Raymond, in violating the pledges which it was supremely necessary to give them. The whole question is a very serious and intricate one, and we may well wait to see what action Government takes in the matter.

The fall of Mr. Crawford a warning to other reckless Civilians.

20. The Dinbandhu (7), in its issue of the 28th April, writes:—Justice has at last overtaken the popular Civilian. The fall of this great man should serve as an example to such members of the ruling race as in the plenitude of their uncontrolled power are often reckless in their career. His Excellency Lord Reay deserves the highest credit for his firmness under great difficulties in sifting this case to the bottom and for his desire of rendering his administration pure. What his Lordship's predecessors shirked in doing has been attempted successfully so far. The fate of Mr. Crawford is also not without its lessons for such of our people as servilely pander to the vices of their superiors.

Praise of His Excellency Lord Reay.

21. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 28th April, writes:—Bombay will always regard His Excellency Lord Reay as a true political reformer and a farsighted statesman. By having taken an enlightened and enterprising body of his own countrymen like the Bombay Chamber of Commerce into confidence, and candidly unfolding before it the acts and measures of his administration and indicating the main springs which have put them into motion, he has broken the back of the bureaucratic system of Government in this country. Never, perhaps, did His Excellency Lord Reay make a better impression on the popular mind than in that first speech which he made, within six months of the assumption of his office, on the occasion of the death of the ever-to-be-lamented Mr. Fawcett. His Lordship prefaced his observations by telling the assembled citizens of Bombay that he had presided there of his own accord, and not by any resolution of the Secretariat. That was the first key-note of his battle against bureaucracy. Not that since that date his Lordship has failed to recognise the good work which that beneficed body of aliens has performed. On the contrary we are in a position to furnish many an instance in which Lord Reay has proved as much of a bureaucrat as any in Bombay. And in no branch of his administration has his Lordship allowed himself, we believe, unwillingly, to play that uncongenial rôle than the one which has been the subject of warm criticism from almost the entire press of the Presidency, and latterly from Mr. Caine, M. P. It may, however, be presumed that whenever Lord Reay has been the mouthpiece of the Secretariat he has been so from necessity rather than conviction.

Praise of His Excellency Lord Reay and a prayer to the Home Government to extend the term of his Lordship's office.

22. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 2nd May, writes:—About after a year His Excellency Lord Reay will retire, and though it may be premature to talk of his services to the Presidency, we think our people ought to be prepared to give an emphatic expression to their feelings—an expression that may induce Her Majesty's Government to extend Lord Reay's term of office. We wrote about this long ago and hoped that opportunity would be taken for such expression. The same expression found place at the last general meeting of the Bombay Presidency Association. Experience tells us that extensions in the case of Governorships are not granted, yet a simple prayer to that effect will show how highly Lord Reay's services are prized and what amount of benefit he would do to this country, if an extension were allowed. Were it not for Lord Reay, the Augean stable of the Civil Service would never have been cleaned and unsullied administrative purity secured.

23. The Kaisar-i-Hind (111), in its issue of the 28th April, writes:—We heartily concur in the recommendation that is being made by newspapers and others for the extension of the term of office of His Excellency Lord Reay. The career of his Lordship has been so beneficial and fruitful to the public of this Presidency that it is very natural that people should express their sense of gratitude by a prayer to Her Majesty the Queen-Empress to extend Lord Reay's Governorship to a further period of five years. For a long time past, Bombay has had no such Governor, so alive to the responsibilities of his position and so industrious in the performance of his duties. His liberal sympathies have resulted in an amount of immense good to this country, which the people will never forget. Bombay should hold a public meeting and should also send delegates to the mofussil for holding meetings there and a petition be prepared in which the benefits derived from the pro-consulship of Lord Reay be set forth and an extension of his term of office asked for. Such a petition will not be without precedent. Similar prayers were made in the cases of Lord Ripon and Sir Charles Aitchison, Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjáb. Whether His Excellency Lord Reay will accede to the request of the people and will serve for a further period is not the point. The people must do their duty. [The Rájyabhakt (126), in its issue of the 30th April, also praises His Excellency Lord Reay and advises the public to ask for an extension of his term of office.]

His Excellency Lord Reay's sudden visit to Porbandar approved, and an extension of his term of office prayed for.

24. The Gujarát Darpan (75), in its issue of the 28th April, writes:—His Excellency Lord Reay's incognito visit to Porbandar on his return journey from Karáchi marks him out as a ruler, who is equally solicitous for the welfare of the princes as of the people. Not to rely on one-sided representations, to see everything with his own eyes and to probe it to the bottom form His Excellency's motto. Then, it is not strange that a proposal to memorialize Her Majesty the Queen to extend His Lordship's term of office, which ends in April next, should be received with favour. Memorials were sent from various towns to extend Lord Ripon's tenure of office but the request was not granted. So we doubt whether the present proposal, if sent Home, will be received with favour. But it is worth sending, if it only serve to show the popularity of the present Governor.

Remarks in connection with the working of the Income-tax Act in the Bombay Presidency during 1887-88.

25. With reference to the resolution of the Bombay Government on the working of the Income-tax Act in the Bombay Presidency during the year 1887-88, the Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 3rd May, says:—This tax is in itself unpopular but has been made doubly so particularly on account of its substitution for the import duties on Europe cotton goods. Bitter complaints were made last year against the collection of the tax at Calcutta, while it is not known what success has been achieved in performing the same work at Madras. But the complete success with which the assessment and collection work has been done in the city of Bombay without giving any cause whatever for complaint is very creditable to the Income-tax Collector and his Assistant; but, strange to say, no acknowledgment to that effect is to be found in the Government resolution. On the other hand, faults have been found with the department for not collecting a small balance that was soon afterwards recovered, and for other petty matters of account-keeping. Considering the great difficulties of the income-tax work Mr. Kharsetji Nasarvánji Seervai, the Collector, and Mr. Hormasji Kharsetji Kurlevála, the Assistant Collector, have done good work and deserve praise from Government. Income-tax is unpopular in itself, but its sting may be lessened by exempting from its operation monthly incomes up to Rs. 200, by bringing under its operation rich landed proprietors, and by raising the rate of taxation as regards higher incomes.

Family cliques in Government offices and the necessity for rigidly enforcing the Government resolution on the subject.

26. The Gujarát Gazette (76), in its issue of the 2nd May, writes:—In the Crawford case is to be found an interesting document. It runs thus:—"The Commissioners should be requested to break up family cliques in the same district and in districts where there is a preponderance of either Bráhmins or Parbhus or Wániás, other castes should be introduced. As a rule the first Kárkún and Mámlatdár should not be of the same caste and relations should not serve in the same Kacheri." This resolution of the Bombay Government is dated 30th March, 1881 and appears evidently to be addressed to the Divisional Commissioners. But naturally it would apply to all departments. The resolution is not very old and yet in many places there will be found close relations serving in one and the same office. A son will be found under the control of his father, brothers working side by side, while cousins and relations of remoter degree would often be found in the same office, or in offices closely connected. We generally hear complaints about men of the same caste preponderating in one office. It is, therefore, very natural that there should be cliques and as a consequence absence of discrimination in giving promotions. It should be the duty of every head of department to see that in his office there is no such clique, and that promotions are given to deserving and proper men. The general belief is that promotions are guided by the head clerk or Shirastedár and the head officer only signs them. In many instances it will be found that subordinate clerks have never had an opportunity to exchange a word with the Sáheb. We have heard some men say that they have never been able to see the face of their Sáheb! The resolution requires to be recirculated and it should not be restricted to the Divisional Commissioners only but should be addressed to all the heads of departments and brought to their notice more emphatically. The resolution should be rigidly enforced. [The Gujarát Darpan (75), in its issue of the 2nd May, says that Government should now and then see whether their resolution on the subject in question is properly carried out or not.]

27. The Káthiáwár Times (81), in its issue of the 1st May, writes:—It is a standing complaint that the tours of district officers instead of proving beneficial to Government and the people are positively detrimental. With the increased facilities of railways, roads, and sub-division of districts, indeed, very little necessity for such tours exists. The advantages resulting from these tours, if there be any, are very few, while the disadvantages are decidedly manifold. Everywhere the cost of feeding the Sáheb and that of fattening capricious clerks, crazed kárkúns, and petulent pattewálláhs falls upon villages. Villagers are very little molested by the officials themselves; the black-mailing is said to be mostly done by what are called "the thieves in livery." Not only, it is said, they fatten themselves at the cost of the poor villagers but arrange to provide for their families as well. We are told that Sir James Fergusson, the ex-Governor of Bombay, was once distinctly told by a Native Chief in the Deccan that his indebtedness and that of many others was due, more or less, to their entertaining district officers, who passed and re-passed through their territories on their never-ending tours. These tours not only prove oppressive to the villagers but to the litigants as well, as they have to march like camp followers from head-quarters to tail-quarters and back again for months together. By these tours Government and the villagers suffer the most. We have known several officers, absurd though it should seem, maintaining themselves solely on travelling allowances; and to none perhaps these tours are more welcome than to the official impedimenta who get plenty of ghee and plenty of milk, perhaps free of cost. In very many instances we have known many officers return from their cold weather tours fatter than they went—fatter, even, we solemnly say, than the fattest Bhátia millionaire of Bombay. [The Praja Mat (124), in its issue of the 27th April, complains of the inconvenience and trouble caused to suitors by the time at which their presence is required and the place of encampment being not duly stated in summonses, &c., issued by district officers while on tour, and remarks that if the Mámlatdárs were to properly state them in the summonses issued by them and if the District Collector were to see to the matter while on tour and to take strict notice of the defaulting officers, the complaint would be speedily remedied.]

A recommendation to reduce the salaries of the Superintendents of Lunatic Asylums in the Bombay Presidency or to appoint full-time Native medical men.

28. The Bakul (22), in its issue of the 28th April, says:—The salaries of the Superintendents of Lunatic Asylums in the Bombay Presidency are very high and should, therefore, be reduced. The policy of retrenchment adopted by Government is faulty inasmuch as they do not consider well which departments of the public administration admit of reduction, but go about curtailing expenditure as if all departments admitted equally of savings. The pay of the post of Superintendent is in addition to his allowances as Civil Surgeon. In that pay many Native graduates or a full-time European officer can be appointed, who will be able to devote his whole time to the work. The present arrangement is not good and Government should, therefore, reduce the salary of the post or appoint full-time men, Natives being given preference to.

Praise of Mr. and Mrs. Sheppard.

29. The Rást Goftár (82), in its issue of the 28th April, writes:—On the eve of the retirement of Mr. Sheppard, Commissioner, N. D., the Government have done well in issuing a resolution, warmly recognizing his efforts to reform the baneful marriage customs of the Laiva Kunbis and Pátidárs. The heavy expenditure attendant upon marriage has brought down the ruin of many of their respectable families. Mr. Sheppard has endeavoured to introduce among them laws binding them to spend no more than a limited sum on nuptial rites and festivities. High Government officers can, from their peculiar position, do much by their aid and advice to ameliorate the social condition of the Natives, and for what Mr. Sheppard has done, beyond his strict official duties, in Gujarát, he will be gratefully remembered by the inhabitants. Mrs. Sheppard was always a warm coadjutor of her husband in all his endeavours for the good of the people. This lady's beneficent efforts, especially directed towards bettering the condition of her own sex in this country, ought to encourage other ladies in her position to follow her example.

Great popularity of Mr. G. F. Sheppard, late Commissioner, N. D.

30. The Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 3rd May, says:—Mr. G. F. Sheppard, late Commissioner, N. D., was very popular. In his long service of 34½ years he secured the affection and respect of Natives and Europeans. Since his becoming Commissioner, N. D., Mr. Sheppard had many opportunities of encouraging the progress of the Natives and he did not allow any of them to go unavailed of. Mr. and Mrs. Sheppard always tried to advance female education in the provinces of the Deccan and Gujarát and to bring about free intercourse between Europeans and Natives, and succeeded in opening branches of the National Indian Association at Poona and Ahmedabad, and induced the Laiva Kunbis to adopt salutary rules for the reduction of marriage and funeral expenses. Mr. Sheppard also took great interest in the advancement of agriculture in Gujarát. The public of this Presidency wish Mr. Sheppard a pleasant voyage and a happy life in his retirement.

Appointment of Dr. Theodore Cooke as Acting Director of Public Instruction, Bombay, approved.

31. The Yajdán Parast (141), in its issue of the 28th April, refers to the appointment of Dr. Theodore Cooke, Principal, College of Science, Poona, as Acting Director of Public Instruction, Bombay, during the absence of Mr. Chatfield, and remarks that Dr. Cooke possesses good experience of the Bombay Educational Department, and that it is hoped that he will turn out a worthy Director of Public Instruction. The paper congratulates the Bombay Government and Dr. Cooke on this appointment.

Appointment of Mr. Ollivant as Political Agent, Káthiáwár.

32. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 28th April, writes:—We are both glad and sorry for the appointment of Mr. E. C. K. Ollivant, our present Municipal Commissioner, to the Political Agency of Káthiáwár. Glad because Mr. Ollivant has been raised to a sphere of higher usefulness whence with the brilliant administrative faculties with which he is endowed he will shine in greater lustre; sorry because the local Municipality loses in him a most efficient officer who has done so much to give tone to our Municipal Government. What is our Bombay's loss will be Káthiáwár's gain, no doubt, where a thoroughly conscientious and straightforward man is much needed to do justice to a post of which fussiness and want of experience of the civil administration have been the great bane. At a Darbár speech some two years ago His Excellency Lord Reay had announced to the Chiefs assembled that their next Political Agent would be a civil servant and that promise his Lordship has just fulfilled. Hitherto the military element has been predominant in almost all political agencies, but how the change affects the agency work has now to be seen. Its success or failure must depend upon the selection made, and at least in this one instance we may expect to see the wishes of Government crowned with success. According to the Advocate of India the post was first offered to Mr. Crawley-Boevey, but that gentleman declined it. Both are competent men, and we entertain every hope that what His Excellency Lord Reay addressed to the assembled Chiefs of Káthiáwár in 1886 as the reasons why his Lordship preferred the change, it will be the ambition of Mr. Ollivant to fully realise.

33. The Káthiáwár Times (81), in its issue of the 1st May, writes:—We have much reason to believe that Mr. Ollivant, if he at all takes charge of this agency, will remain at the post for a very short time; and Mr. Lely will be confirmed as Political Agent. Mr. Ollivant is a man of high abilities and comprehensive views, but he lacks express local knowledge, and without this qualification a Political Agent is never expected to cut a creditable figure, at least for a while. Mr. Ollivant is an efficient administrator, but it is very doubtful if his decisions in political cases will gain the approbation both of Government and the Káthiáwár people. It is very well known that the political decisions of even an officer of the calibre of Sir James Peile were never much approved of. The efficiency of the Political Agents generally rests in the distribution of political justice. Mr. Ollivant is a good financier, but we are not aware if he is a good political officer. If he is quite a novice in this branch of work he will experience a deal of trouble for some time. Without local experience and a considerable knowledge of the prevailing Khatpat in the province a Political Agent is not likely to succeed in his work. In making this appointment His Excellency has, perhaps, thought—not without much justification—that the province stands in as much need of sanitary efficiency as in other matters. He is a thorough business man and capable of standing any strain that he might be subjected to. This will be much appreciated as the nervous system of Political Agents are habitually kept at a high tension all through. Mr. Lely has been Administrator of Porbandar for the last three years, and in this capacity he has done excellent work. He is a calm, capable, cautious and experienced officer, but he must know that there is much difference between an Administrator of a State and a Political Agent of a province. A Political Agent should sit in judgment on such opinions as have been invited by him and not be guided by them. If he keeps this constantly in view he will make an efficient and strong officer. We have no doubt that Mr. Lely will prove a very good Political Agent particularly as his tendencies have been in the direction just pointed out. Heads of departments generally suffer obloquy through being guided by interested underlings, and by indulging in certain other weaknesses which public officers ought strictly to be free from.

34. The Rást Goftár (82), in its issue of the 28th April, writes:—Mr. Ollivant, Municipal Commissioner, Bombay, has accepted the appointment of Political Agent, Káthiáwár; and no one can question Mr. Ollivant's fitness for that high and responsible office. To say that he has attained conspicuous success as Municipal Commissioner, is saying a great deal. For this office makes an ever-increasing demand on the care and attention of the incumbent, who must possess ability, tact, and a capacity for work, in a very high degree, in order to succeeed in it. After a long interval, Mr. Ollivant will be the first Civilian employed as Political Agent of Káthiáwár, and "vested interests" may clamour against the innovation. We do not think it is necessary any longer always to have military men as political officers, and it is an indirect testimony to the peace and good order now reigning in Káthiáwár that a Civilian has now been appointed at the head of its Political Agency. While we admit that there is no danger in Civilians being entrused with such important political appointments, we hope that, in this particular instance, the claims of military officers serving for many years in the Káthiáwár Agency have not been overlooked. We do not know whether Colonel Nutt, who has been in political employment for the past twenty-three years, some fifteen of which have been spent in Káthiáwár, had not a fair claim to the vacancy caused by the death of his cousin, Colonel Watson. Colonel Nutt has long experience of Káthiáwár in which he has spent the best years of his life, and has contributed, in no small measure, to the welfare and progress of that province. Gondal owes much of its prosperity to the administration of Colonel Nutt during the minority of its present Chief. As one having a thorough knowledge of the province and its people, it would have been very satisfactory, if he had been placed in charge of the Political Agency. [A few other papers also approve of the appointment in question.]

Disapproval of the appointment of Ráo Sáheb R. B. Karandikar as Acting Head Master, Dhárwár High School.

35. The Havyak Subodh (144), in its issue of the 30th April, disapproves of the appointment of Ráo Sáheb R. B. Karandikar as Acting Head Master of the Dhárwár High School, and says that he ought to have been appointed Curator, Government Central Book Depôt, Bombay.

Appointments in the High Court of Bombay and the claims of Natives.

36. The Kaiser-i-Hind (111), in its issue of the 28th April, says that almost all the big appointments in the Bombay High Court are given to Europeans, and asks whether there are no competent Natives who can fill up those appointments. The recent vacancy caused by Mr. Kirkpatrick's absence on leave has, observes the Kaiser, been given to a European barrister, although there were many Native barristers of equal abilities who could have been appointed to that post. Such partiality in the disposal of patronage is, adds the paper, not honest and the claims of all classes should be recognized by the High Court authorities. [The Gujarát Gazette (76) and the Hitechchhu (79) of Ahmedabad, in their respective issues of the 2nd May, make a similar complaint, the latter adding that Englishmen are very selfish and that the Natives and the Native Press should strengthen public bodies like the Indian National Congress, and should claim their rights through them instead of complaining in vain.]

Revised lists of jurors in Bombay criticised.

37. The Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 4th May, says:—The revised list of jurors in Bombay, published as a supplement to a recent issue of the Government Gazette, does not seem to have been prepared with due care. In the list of Hindu special jurors is the name of Mr. Gokuldás Jagmohandás, who died some time ago, the announcement of the event appearing in the newspapers, and to whose family His Excellency the Governor wrote a letter of condolence; and in the list of Pársi special jurors stands the name of Mr. Frámji Hormasji Mehta, who died a year and a half ago. When there are such flagrant mistakes in the list of special jurors, one might well conceive what must be the number of errors in the longer list of common jurors. It is desirable therefore that the suggestion made before of appointing a committee composed of the leading members of the different communities for assisting in the preparation of the jury lists should be adopted without delay. The committee would be very useful in finding out who are fit to be empannelled on a special jury and who on a common jury, who have died or have left Bombay for good, and who are well acquainted with the English language. The principle on which the jury lists are now prepared does not seem to be clear and well-defined, since the name of one partner of a mercantile firm is put in the list of special jurors, while that of another partner stands in that of common jurors.

Want of a Subordinate Judge in the Thar and Párkar District.

38. The Sind Sudhár (165), in its issue of the 20th April, writes:—The neglected district of Thar and Párkar! Not a single Subordinate Judge in it! Though it boasts of a large area, of the richness of its soil, of the abundance of water in the Nára, and of yielding large revenues to Government, yet it is a neglected district. There is no doubt that Mr. Horace Bell rightly decided that to construct a railway in the desert of Thar and Párkar would be a sheer waste of public money. Now every person, nay the Government of Bombay itself, blames Mr. Horace Bell as having obstructed the construction of the railway. But does the Government of Bombay ever blame itself for having neglected the district of Thar and Párkar? In such a large district it has kept neither a full-time Superintendent of Police, nor a single Subordinate Judge. The administration of civil justice is entrusted to revenue officials not acquainted with the civil law. In the case of the other districts, Government, for fear, lest the ends of justice be defeated, have decided not to entrust the powers of Subordinate Judge to any one who does not qualify himself for the exercise of such powers by passing the Higher Standard Pleaders' Examination; while in the Thar and Párkar District, Government liberally gives these powers to any one. Excepting the present Mukhtyárkar of Umarkot, will any other Mukhtyárkar or even the Deputy Collector of the district say that he is well up in the civil law or that he has passed the Pleaders' Examination. We are really astonished to see that Government neglects the Thar and Párkar District in this way. It cannot keep even a single Subordinate Judge in it, though it incurs unnecessary expenditure in the other districts. But if Government cannot spare money to supply the wants of the Thar and Párkar District, we suggest that the appointments of the Deputy Collector and Mukhtyárkars be given only to such persons as have passed examinations according to the Higher Departmental test and in the Civil Procedure Code paper. If the services of qualified men cannot be secured, at present, then, let these examinations be held in Sindhi also, so that the people may have no excuse for not passing them. By this arrangement, Government will lose nothing; on the contrary, it will be a gainer by having qualified men who would do its work more satisfactorily than at present.

Mr. Khushirám, Registrar of the Small Cause Court, Karáchi, and the necessity for inquiring into his case.

39. The Sindh Sudhár (165), in its issue of the 20th April, writes:—We were sanguine that during his recent visit to Sind, His Excellency Lord Reay would personally inquire into the case of Mr. Khushirám Khuthonmal, Registrar, Small Cause Court at Karáchi, and cancel the orders already passed in respect of that officer. We are unable to understand why such a just and benevolent Governor as Lord Reay did not do so. To degrade such an honest and intelligent servant of Government merely on the complaint of two or three persons, and without instituting any inquiries, is inconsistent with the just policy of the British Government. If, after full inquiries, any guilt had been established against that officer, there would have been no reason to criticise the action of Government. Of all the gentlemen, who have hitherto held the office of the Registrar, Small Cause Court, Mr. Khushirám seems to be the most intelligent, impartial and painstaking. From persons constantly going to the Small Cause Court, we hear that the present incumbent has, during the short time he has held the appointment of Registrar, Small Cause Court, introduced several useful reforms in the working of the Court, whereby the work is disposed of satisfactorily and promptly. Seeing that this officer has done so much for the public good, the people are very sorry to hear of his degradation without any fault. By the transfer of this officer, the work of the Court will also be interfered with, as both the Judge and the Registrar will be new. We hope that the new Judge, Mr. Mahomed Hassan Hakim, will see to this and make some suitable arrangement in the matter.

Complaint against Captain Kennedy, Acting 3rd Assistant to the Political Agent, Káthiáwár, and his Shirastedár, Mr. Vithalrái.

40. The Rájyabhakt (126), in its issue of the 30th April, says that Captain Kennedy's work as an Assistant to the Political Agent, Káthiáwár, has done much harm to the Princes and the people, that intrigues have increased, that selfish persons have succeeded in their objects, and that he is responsible for this state of things. The paper wishes to know how the Captain's Shirastedár, Mr.

Vithalrái, who enjoys much confidence of his master, could have been able to build a house in the Rájkot Civil Station, when his salary has been Rs. 50 per mensem since his appointment to the present post two years ago, and remarks that an explanation in the matter is necessary, as even taking money or borrowing it from his subordinates is culpable. It then complains of the intrigues of the trusted Daftardárs of Political Agents, and requests Government to speedily transfer them.

Insufficient rewards given to Native military officers and soldiers for performing acts of conspicuous gallantry in engagements with the enemy.

41. The Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 4th May, says:—In the last Government Gazette it is notified that Jamádár Aziz Khán, Lance Náik Alláhadád Khán, and Sepoy Káim Khán, all of the 27th Bombay Infantry, have been admitted to the third class of the Order of Merit for showing conspicuous gallantry in an engagement with the enemy in Burmah on 1st January 1889. The valour exhibited by the three soldiers as described in the Gazette itself was of a nature that deserved the reward of a Victoria Cross to these gallant men. If similar gallantry were shown by a European military officer or soldier he would certainly be rewarded with a V. C. There seems no good reason for making an invidious distinction between Europeans and Natives in the matter of rewards for similar exhibitions of valour. Native officers and soldiers require more encouragement than they receive at present for coming forward in large numbers to perform acts of valour in engagements with the enemy.

Complaint that some Commanding Officers have prohibited the men of their regiments from reading the Pandit newspaper.

42. The Pandit (160), in its issue of the 3rd May, says:—We are trying our best to communicate all the general orders to military men, and thus serve Government as well as their military officers. Such good work as this ought to be approved by all; but there are some officers who try to discourage it by exercising their official authority. We have sufficient proof in our hands to show that some Commanding Officers have threatened the men of their regiments with trial by a court-martial if they are discovered reading the Pandit newspaper. We hope Government will kindly inquire into the matter, and prohibit the issue of such despotic orders.

Inconvenience suffered by passengers on board coasting steamers plying between Ratnágiri and Bombay and the negligence of Government in the matter.

43. The Bakul (22), in its issue of the 28th April, again brings to the notice of Government the serious inconvenience which passengers on board coasting steamers plying between Ratnágiri and Bombay are made to suffer through the carelessness and negligence of the steamer authorities. The Government are, observes the paper, also to blame in this matter. Their negligence and inattention in this respect are highly culpable. Government should immediately take this question in hand and frame some rules for the guidance of the steamer companies. Government make rules about the sanitation of villages and about other unimportant matters, but this patent inconvenience, although brought to their notice several times, escapes their attention.

A suggestion to the Ahmedabad Police.

44. The Samsher Báhádur (127) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 3rd May, says that travellers are afraid of being plundered by the Kolis, who are starving and wander about, and suggests that the police authorities should furnish a few armed sepoys to companies of men and women at marriages following the bridegrooms when they go from one town to another on the payment of some fee, as such a course would be beneficial both to the police and wedding parties.

A complaint against the postal peons of Poona.

45. The Poona Vaibhav (48), in its issue of the 28th April, says that much inconvenience is caused to the people of Poona by the postal peons not delivering letters and packets at the proper time, i.e., soon after the arrival of the trains, brings this inconvenience to the notice of the postal authorities, and hopes that they will take measures and see that important letters and other packets are delivered to their owners at the proper time. It also suggests to Government the propriety of locating the post office in the city, says that the removal will minimise the inconvenience a great deal, and is of opinion that the post office is located outside the city only to suit the convenience of Europeans, and that it cannot be justified on any reasonable ground.

Part II.—Legislation.

A prayer to amend the Religious Endowment Act.

46. In noticing the steps taken by the Madras Mahájan Association for preferring a memorial to Government praying for certain changes in the Religious Endowment Act, the Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 30th April, says:—Not only are the Hindu temples and other religious endowments in all parts of the country mismanaged, but similar endowments of other religionists are also misappropriated. The Hindus, Mahomedans, Pársis, and others complain that their religious funds are not properly taken care of and that they are misappropriated without there being any legal remedy to prevent such malversation on account of the defects in the Religious Endowment Act. It is, therefore, to be hoped that steps will be taken at an early date to amend the Act so as to remove effectually the complaint about the mismanagement of religious funds.

Part III.—Education.

Necessity for improving the management of the Rájkumár College, Rájkot.

47. The Rájyabhakt (126), in its issue of the 30th April, once more writes about the Rájkumár College, Rájkot, points out that private tutors are unnecessary for, and a useless burden on, the Princes studying in it as expressed last year by Captain W. B. Ferris, then Acting Third Assistant to the Political Agent, Káthiáwár, and Mr. C. H. Candy, Acting Principal of the College, and observes that Mr. Principal Macnaghten's opinion in favour of retaining them is interested and unimportant. It complains of there being 7 or 8 classes in the college with a separate teacher for each class, while the total number of students is thirty only, and says that Mr. Macnaghten's object in increasing the number of assistant teachers is to provide for his favourites and that Government should improve the management.

Part IV.—Municipalities.

The strike of the ghárriwállás and the New Municipal Act, Bombay.

48. The Rást Goftár (82), in its issue of the 28th April, writes:—The wheel-tax levied by the Bombay Municipality on all sorts of conveyances is very heavy. The fees used to be received before in two half-yearly instalments. But under the new Municipal Act it is stipulated that the fee for the whole year should be paid at once, and in advance. It is hard that the owners of hack victorias, reklás and carts should be made to pay the whole sum down. But it is a well-known fact that the old system enabled defaulters—and they were most numerous among cart-drivers—to evade payment of the tax for the second half of the year. This involved a loss of several thousand rupees to the Municipality every year, and it was to provide against this loss that it was enacted that the whole amount of the fees should be paid in the lump before the licenses could be given. We are, therefore, glad that in arriving at a satisfactory arrangement with the ghárriwállás, Mr. Ollivant has succeeded in upholding the principle of ready payment, although he has wisely allowed certain concessions on minor points. No one will suppose that the reductions which have to be made in the license-fees are a heavy price paid for keeping the principle intact. The Municipal Commissioner has gained his point, and his success is a benefit to the city.

49. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 28th April, writes:—Actual experience of things brings new knowledge and so the enforcement of the new Bombay Municipal Act let in the new light that in the manipulation of the Act the hackney cart-drivers' hard lot did not receive due consideration, and the last two days' strike has been the result of its enforcement. It is impossible to imagine the amount of inconvenience the trade and the general public has been put to during the short space of forty-eight hours for which this strike lasted. In the first place the cumulative wheel-tax on labour conveyances is very heavy, and this heaviness was made more burdensome by a demand upon their owners to pay the tax in one lump sum and not in instalments as in the case of gentlemen's carriages. That while the richer people should be allowed to pay their tax in parts, the poorer owners of carts should be asked to pay down their quota at once does not speak much in favour of the Municipal régime. The local Gazette is justly indignant in its remarks on the heaviness of the tax when it says that in England the hackney carriage license is only fifteen shillings a year, or a little more than half the tax on a Bombay labour-cart, and a mere flee-bite in comparison with the Bombay hackney carriage owner's tax of sixty-eight rupees per annum. The last two days' experience in the annals of Bombay traffic has been a bitter one, and we hope no further action of the Municipality in the matter will be allowed to give a cause for such further strikes. In the meanwhile we ask the Assessment Department so to arrange the levy of the tax as not to allow it to be felt by these poor people who contribute so much to the comfort and convenience of the Bombay general public. If the Municipal Act lays down for its realisation in a lump sum, let the executive move in the matter and get the requisite amendment made.

The Bombay Municipal Corporation and the recently formed Local School Board.

50. The Subodha Patrika (16), in its issue of the 28th April, writes :—The Bombay Municipal Corporation has shown cliquism and unreason in the matter of the Local School Board establishment. In claiming the right to appoint servants who have to work under the Board, the Corporation evinced a child's love of power in preference to an established principle of sound administration. The Corporation has to pay the men and, therefore, it must appoint them. Well, the real payers are the tax-payers, why then not let them elect the Secretary to the Board as well ? Then the hurry to make the appointment and fix the pay before even the full extent of the work is known is not creditable. Why, too, should the place have been given in the hole and corner fashion in these days of competition ? An assistant master in a private school and reporter to a daily newspaper may conceal much fitness for the new work, but so proved a one as an experienced Deputy Educational Inspector or other equally eligible candidates might have been invited to apply. But we fancy all local self-government must give way to the reign of canvassing or cliquism. This is the great stumbling-block in the way of all corporations whether in Bombay or the mofussil and we have seen so little reason, in spite of much formal compliments, to make a distinction between the two that we should not be surprised at the present instance which after all is a small affair compared to many others of greater moment to the welfare of the city.

The appointment to the Joint School Committee's Secretaryship, Bombay, criticised.

51. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 29th April, writes :—The Bombay Municipal Corporation has at last stultified itself by making its appointment to the School Committee's Secretaryship in hot haste on Thursday last. It seemed as though a large number of the members had come to the meeting fully determined to carry the motion and even the idea of a contrary opinion seemed to many of them a matter for laughter and derision. An intelligent minority led by Mr. Javerilál fought hard to save the Corporation from the blunder it was intent on making, but their efforts were unavailing. All argument was lost upon the men who came to the meeting, so to say, pledged to one view and whose minds were so fully occupied with that one view that it left no room for another. It was pointed out that the Corporation had pledged itself in a manner not to make any appointments until the condition insisted on in its former resolutions was fulfilled. It was in vain pointed out that the Committee had already a Secretary, a qualified educational officer, and a graduate who served the Committee without pay for the last five or six months and might have so served it until the Corporation was in a proper position to make its permanent appointment. This spectacle of reason and common sense fighting with passion and prejudice would have been amusing if it were not painful. We are sorry for the credit of our Corporation for good sense and businesslike work. Last Thursday's proceedings will show that it is not above jobbery and the petty temptations of power and patronage. They also prove unmistakably the evil of the predominance of one single class in our deliberative assembly and show the urgency of equalizing the different elements.

The recent Municipal elections at Poona and a suggestion for passing an act on the lines of the improper practices act in England.

52. The same newspaper writes:—The Municipality of Poona is under a cloud. The late Municipal elections have been reported on by the local officers unfavourably as having been influenced by improper practices and the Government has published a resolution which warns the Municipality to reform its ways under pain of a penalty. The Resolution does not specify the individuals or wards guilty of the alleged practices, and it is rightly complained that this promiscuous censure is improper. We are told the Municipality is going to protest against this promiscuous censure, and to ask Government to specify the charges. If the challenge is made, we do not know how the Government will meet it, or whether Government is in a position to support its charges. But in any case it is an unpleasant prospect to have new startling disclosures. There is no reason why Government should rest any legislative measure on the demands and condition of a single town. In the last Bombay Municipal elections there were whispers of improper practices, and we then suggested that an improper practices act like the one in England might usefully be passed to correct the abuses at elections. Any measure that may be contemplated should be passed on consideration of general utility and one single town or city should not be invidiously selected as a scapegoat.

Corrupt practices in Municipal elections alleged to be prevalent in other towns than Poona.

53. The Rást Goftár (82), in its issue of the 28th April, writes:—The Government must be presumed to have very good grounds for issuing the resolution warning future aspirants to municipal honours in Poona against bribery and corruption at elections. We hope that the Government has been mis-informed, though we apprehend that there is probably too good reason for the belief that corrupt practices are resorted to by unscrupulous candidates in other places besides Poona. During the last general Municipal elections in Bombay we were in a position to say, from trustworthy information received by us, that one or two dishonest candidates had stooped to the payment of bribes for the purchase of votes, and that if the evil was not nipped in the bud, it would have to be prevented by a legislative enactment. The force of public opinion may, however, be able to arrest the progress of the evil, before it has assumed serious dimensions. At the last elections, an elector came near one of our informants and whispered in his ear that he had yet one vote to be disposed of, which he was willing to sell for Rs. 5! We were also informed that a candidate, whose intellectual qualifications are in inverse proportion to his wealth, had actually entered into a contract with the touts he had employed, that he should pay them so much for so many votes. Such men are a disgrace to the Municipal board of a city like Bombay, and yet it is such men who can secure by fair means and foul, and by means more foul than fair, far more votes than the honest and the deserving. Public opinion must be aroused on the subject. The public press must be vigilant to detect and expose the practices of men, who combine worthlessness with dishonesty, so that our Corporation may, as far as possible, be purged of the presence of lumbers, worse than useless.

PART V.—Native States.

His Highness the Máhárája Holkar blamed for his bad conduct.

54. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 24th April, writes:—Of all the present Native Princes the position of the young Máhárája Holkar is the least enviable. Advice seems to be lost upon him and his family and other disputes are attracting attention. In the work of administration and in his relations with the representatives of the paramount power he is careless and apt to become unpleasant. He seems to have forgotten that high as his rank is his position is very different from that of other princes who enjoy treaty rights. His Highness the Holkar holds a sanad from the British Government and this can be cancelled at any time. It is time that his friends gave up attempting to defend him, and did a real friendly duty towards him—warn him. The same newspaper in its issue of the 27th April, writes:—His Highness the Máhárája Holkar is again rapidly developing into a thorn in the side of the Supreme Government. In his case all the fault appears to lie on his side. Friendly advice has had no effect, and in reply to all good counsel he sulks. There is no knowing to what length he will go or whether he will find out his mistake before it is too late. A little friendly firmness might make him straight.

His Highness the Máhárája of Jodhpur praised for encouraging native industry.

55. The Gujaráti (77), in its issue of the 28th April, expresses joy at the action of His Highness the Máháraja of Jodhpur having ordered his subjects to use articles of native manufacture by way of encouragement to indigenous industry, considers it an example of true patriotism, and recommends the Native Princes of Gujarát to imitate the example. [The Pársi Tikákár (123), in its issue of the 1st May, expresses similar sentiments.]

Mal-administration of the estates of Tálukdárs in Káthiáwár.

56. The Rájyabhakt (126), in its issue of the 30th April, writes:—Here is a recent, definite instance of the mal-administration of the estates of Tálukdárs, who are wards of the Agency in Káthiáwár. The tálukás we speak of are those of Bagasra and Wudia. These tálukás, now under Agency supervision, have lately subscribed to the Watson Memorial Fund Rs. 100 and Rs. 200 respectively. The question is how did lifeless things like tálukás (lands) subscribe the above sums? What persons did really and virtually subscribe those sums to the Fund? Who is in charge of the treasury of those tálukás at present? Is not this a waste of money, a wrongful act? The Chiefs of these tálukás are minors and wards of the Agency. The treasury of their estates from which the above sums have been subscribed is now in the hands of Agency officers. The names, therefore, of the estates have been guardedly and knowingly put opposite the sums to delude the people into a false belief that they were subscribed by persons by whom they are not subscribed. Every body knows that a lifeless thing as estate can never "subscribe" any more than it can eat and drink or rejoice and lament. The act, then, becomes one of persons at the head of these estates who, by doing an act beyond the legitimate scope of their powers, have abused the trust reposed in them. Either they are strangers to their duties and responsibilities or if they profess to know them they are outright blinded by favouritism as not to discriminate between breaches of trust and acts of duty. Are they not answerable? Moreover, it is an established practice that every expenditure from the treasury of Agency wards requires in the first place the sanction of the Ránt officer. When such sanction is necessary, why should the Ránt officer also be not held responsible for sanctioning what he had no authority to do? The matter as it stands now is mystic enough, and a peremptory and prompt explanation is required to clear it up in the interest of justice. For the public knows that the late Colonel Watson has provided his proteges everywhere in the province, and they attempt to mislead public feeling at the cost of other persons whose interests they are bound and paid to protect. The same is the case with Mánáwadar.

Complaint against His Highness the Nawáb of Cambay.

57. The Kambhát Samáchár (114), in its issue of the 3rd May, says that His Highness the Nawáb of Cambay is a simple man, that he passes his time in pleasure, wastes money on dancing girls and personal attendants, that he is powerless, that Mr. Shámráo, the Diván, has proved unfit for the post he holds, and that the Nawáb should attend to the welfare of his subjects.

A recommendation to appoint Mr. Mahájani, Educational Inspector, Berár, as Acting Director of Public Instruction of that province.

1. The Pramod Sindhu (1), in its issue of the 26th April, suggests that in the absence of Mr. Jatár on sick leave for one year Mr. Mahájani, M.A., Educational Inspector, be appointed Director of Public Instruction for the province of Berár. Mr. Mahájani, says the paper, is an able man and has served as inspector for many years. The Berár directorship is specially created for Natives. No abler man could be found for that post than Mr. Mahájani.

Alleged high-handed police action in Amráoti.

2. The Berár Samáchár (3), in its issue of the 29th April, writes:—In October or November last a shroff of Amráoti and one or two others were called upon by the local police to show them certain ornaments which they had purchased. They showed the ornaments and the corresponding entries in their account-books. The police were, it would appear, satisfied that the ornaments were not stolen property. One would expect that if those that possessed the ornaments were not criminally prosecuted for some offence in connection with them, the ornaments would be returned in due course to their owners. But the police sent the ornaments to the Magistrate as 'Lawaris' property, that is, 'ownerless' property. The Magistrate calls upon the abovenamed persons to prove that the ornaments belong to them. These men, after dancing attendance on the Magistrate more than once, show the entries in their account-books and say they bought the ornaments from another respectable Sávkár of the place and give out his name. The Magistrate refers these men to the District Magistrate who, it is said, issued notices as if the ornaments were 'Lawaris' or ownerless property. Now if these facts are correct, and we believe they are substantially correct, how can either the police or the Magistrate justify their action? Can police officials go and fetch other people's property and send it on to a Magistrate as ownerless property; and is it right that the Magistrate should countenance this? It is monstrous to snatch a thing from a person and tell him that he must prove his ownership before he can get it back. We hope that the authorities concerned will take due steps in the matter so as not to add insult to injury as regards the owners of the ornaments.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

The condemnation of the excise policy of the Government of India in the House of Commons approved.

1. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 6th May, writes:—The condemnation of the excise policy of the Government of India which the House of Commons has passed on Mr. Smith's motion is as important as it is unprecedented. The result is all the more interesting as the motion seems to have been accepted against the protest of Sir John Gorst on behalf of the Government of India. It is now regretted that Government did not use their whips properly, who by timely action might have, it is supposed, prevented the defeat. The effect of the defeat is sought to be mitigated by suggesting that the aim of the House of Commons in approving of Mr. Smith's motion was only a moral one and that it had no reference to its practical results. The Government of India are also said to be resolved not to take any action until they receive a definite despatch from the Secretary of State for India. In spite of all these discouraging reports and surmises let us hope that the motion will not be barren of results. Sir John Gorst is reported to have said that the system is susceptible of reforms which were being introduced. He indeed asked the resolution to be rejected "as it was an unmerited censure on the Government of India, ignoring the laudable efforts which had been made for years past to promote temperance." But this part of Sir John's speech evidently did not meet with the confidence of the House of Commons. Whether meant as a moral or a practical censure, the resolution is sure to be potent in its results. The Contagious Diseases Acts were believed to be equally irreversible and equally favoured by the Government as their excise policy, but the condemnatory resolution of the House of Commons immediately sealed their fate. In the present case there is a strong fiscal interest to oppose the reform. His Excellency the Viceroy has committed himself to a policy of approval of the present system. The evil will therefore die hard, if it dies at all. Sir John Gorst's admission that the system was susceptible of reforms is some assurance that an effort will be made to introduce them. The formal resolution of censure which the House of Commons has passed will, it is to be hoped, expedite the introduction. In any case the resolution is valuable as evidence of an awakening of the public conscience in England, and the British public conscience once awakened seldom fails to carry out its convictions.

2. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 5th May, writes:—The agitation against the drink question, assisted by men like Mr. Caine, M. P., and Mr. Samuel Smith, M. P., has had a happy result in the House of Commons. The burden of the complaint, as in the case of opium revenue, never pressed Government to give up a legitimate fiscal source, but so to manage it as to suppress every tendency to increased consumption. The apologists of Government have spared no pains to show that increase of duty did mean decrease in consumption, though the theory started under such authoritative colours has been exploded here as well as by Mr. Caine in his very able letters to the English newspapers. Were it not for him none would have cared to raise a discussion on the point in the House of Commons under such favourable auspices. Sir R. Leithbridge, Mr. MacLaren and other advocates of temperance took part, and the question was so ably argued from all points of the administrative compass that even Sir John Gorst, with all his puzzling statistical armoury at his elbow, was forced into a virtual admission that there was intemperance and that the ábkári administration was susceptible of reform. The moral of the Government defeat on this question cannot but be highly satisfactory. It must teach the people of this country that every legitimate agitation, persistently carried on in England and assisted by members of Parliament, will bring good results. What we greatly need is the frequent visits to this country of independent members of Parliament—members who will not care to examine things with the aid of official spectacles, and an agency to work and ventilate important State questions, so that the British public may be in a position to verify official statements by comparison with what the Indian public may have to say. Recent ventilation has created an amount of curiosity and desire in Englishmen to know how the affairs of their great dependency are administered by their deputies out here. This awakening is by no means a small gain; what is greatly needed is a fully developed machinery to keep members of Parliament fully informed and the British public within reach of such information. Such an agency is now an accomplished fact, but it requires help which it is the bounden duty of our people to furnish liberally. We hope sanguinely that there will be no disappointment on this score. What the new agency is expected to do Mr. Knight of the Calcutta Statesman once did in the pages of the London Statesman, but be it said to our shame that for want of support from our people he failed. However, times have changed and a better appreciation of our real position may induce our people to liberally strengthen the hands of the new agency.

3. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 5th May, writes:—The Government of India has met with humiliation, but it deserved it. It had been given fair warning. It did not give any heed to the protests coming from the public. On the contrary, it always sought to justify itself. Sir John Gorst fairly acknowledged that the system was susceptible of reforms; but, so far as we know, the different administrations in India have rarely, if ever, admitted this. A sense seemed to pervade every official that the system was infallible and free from all defects. It is right, therefore, that the eyes of the Government should be opened. Now at least there is hope that some check will be put upon the liberality with which licenses were issued hitherto to poison the public. In Poona every vantage-ground has been occupied by a gutta. Sometimes we meet with two or three guttas in one lane, standing only a few paces apart from one another. This wholesale poisoning of the population was a stigma to the fair name of England. We hope the emphatic condemnation of the House of Commons will now make the Government see the error of its ways and induce it to really reform its ábkári policy, not in the direction of increased revenue but in that of prohibition. We thank Messrs. Smith, Caine, Leithbridge and others for the service they have done to the whole of India. [Several other papers also express satisfaction with the resolution passed by the House of Commons, hope that the Government of India will now improve their ábkári policy, and thank Messrs. Smith, Caine and other members of Parliament for their exertions in the matter.]

4. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 1st May, writes:—If the advice given by the Secretary of State for India to the Government of India with regard to the silver plate duties were generally followed, there would be an end to all protestation and the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury would be left to modify the present duties or not at their own sweet will. This sort of complacence rebels against the very spirit of agitation and we are pleased that the Bombay Chamber of Commerce have not taken the hint. If it is clearly established that the incidence of the present duty on silver plate is inequitable, then the case for agitation is also established. Whether the Lords Commissioners are pleased or otherwise, whether their dignity may be ruffled or not, are considerations which may weigh with the Secretary of State for India and the Government, but public opinion is happily a freer agent. Side by side with the agitation for the imposition of the English factory laws in India may be placed the agitation against the duties on silver plate, and the commercial justice that India gets at the hands of England will be easily seen. It seems a great pity that the Bombay Chamber of Commerce should be the solitary champion of the roughridden rights of the Indian exporters of silver plate. In a movement of this nature all commercial bodies, and even political bodies, should join as in a common cause.

The dilatoriness of the India Council and the advisability of agitating for its abolition.

5. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 5th May, writes:—The recommendations of the Public Service Commission, together with the reports thereon of the local Governments, have now been before the India Council for a decently long time, and yet the Council has not been able to arrive at satisfactory conclusions. We may take this as a sign that the conclusions of the Commission, which in many instances are very prejudicial to the natives of this country and which betray an exclusive and retrogressive spirit, do not meet with the approval of the Council. If this be so, then we might indeed tolerate the existence of that Council for a few years longer; but if, on the other hand, the Councillors join the Commissioners in crushing down all our hopes and curbing all our just and natural aspirations, then our leaders will have to consider the advisability of agitating for the abolition of the Council by bringing before the British public the wrongs that it has hitherto perpetrated.

The situation in Burmah.

6. The Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 6th May, says:—Three years have passed away since the first occupation of Burmah by British troops, and still the country remains as unpacified as it was at the date of the conquest. Small expeditions are frequently sent to punish and disperse the dacoits and to reduce to subjection Burmese chieftains and clans, ending in considerable carnage of the enemy and some loss among the British troops. Burmah has thus become a slaughter-house of human beings, the like of which is hardly to be found in the pages of history, inflicting a heavy pecuniary loss on the Indian treasury. This is the result of Lord Dufferin's injurious warlike policy, belieing His Lordship's boast at the Byculla Club dinner last year that Burmah was almost nearly pacified. A few months ago an assurance was given that a large portion of the troops in Burmah would be soon withdrawn as the work of pacification had been considerably achieved, but this assurance has not been as yet carried out, nor is it likely to be soon realized. Since Russia has been able to secure considerable influence in Persia and her movements in Central Asia have been of late very suspicious, it is not discreet to permit Indian troops to remain longer in Burmah. On the whole, Burmah has become a dead weight to India, proving the unwisdom of Lord Dufferin's policy.

Revival of the Famine Insurance Fund strongly disapproved.

7. The Gujarát Mitră (78) of the 5th May does not understand how the Secretary of State for India will be able to revive the Famine Insurance Fund as now contemplated without re-allotting to it the amount of money already spent from it on other purposes, as he does not state that a new tax is to be imposed for re-establishing the fund and as no surplus is left every year in the Indian treasury, and remarks that if a new tax is to be levied for the purpose the people of India must go with one meal a day only, as this is the only remedy now left for them. The paper adds that there is another remedy, viz., to leave the British rule and go to some other State, but that is impossible, as 25 krors of people cannot be accommodated in any one State and that high-class Hindus cannot go to Russia and other countries.

Adulteration of Indian wheat exported to England.

8. In alluding to the result of the wheat conference convened by the Secretary of State for India, the Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 11th May, says that the proper course in this matter is the one pointed out by the London Corn Association and the Indian Committee, namely, to desist from interference with trade, and this view is the same as that entertained by the natives of India who are glad that the conference dissolved without arriving at a specific conclusion. [The Jáme Jamshed (108) of the same date remarks that the hope expressed by Lord Cross that the impurities in Indian wheat will gradually lessen is not likely to be soon realized unless the Corn Association in London and the principal Chambers of Commerce in England render their help in bringing about the desired result. It adds that respectable corn merchants in India are for lessening the impurities and the Indian farmer can be soon made to see his own benefit by keeping the wheat free from impurities, but what is urgently needed is the determination of the English corn merchants and millers not to accept wheat containing more than two per cent. adulteration.]

Reduced consumption of Indian opium in China.

9. In noticing the Government resolution on the report of the working of the Opium Department of the Bombay Presidency for the year 1887-88, the Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 8th May, says:—The marked decrease in the consumption of Indian opium in China in recent years ought to induce Government to effect a reduction in the present heavy duty levied on this drug, since the reduction is sure to increase the total revenue realized from this source. The Indian drug is more wholesome than the indigenous Chinese produce and Persian opium, and hence there ought to be no scruples for the encouragement of the consumption of the Indian drug. The Government have in their resolution called for reports on the causes of the reduction of the revenue from this source in certain districts and Native States of this presidency. It is, however, to be hoped that steps will be taken to prevent officers of the Opium Department from working with the impression that Government are anxious to increase the revenue from this source, as has happened in the case of the Ábkári Department.

Sir Henry Cunningham's estimate of English public criticism of Indian affairs found fault with.

10. With reference to Sir Henry Cunningham's remark that the Indian Government labours under a great drawback caused by the ignorant and impertinent criticisms made upon its acts by persons in England, &c., the Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 9th May, says:—Sir Henry may be requested to quote an instance in which any great and useful measure projected in India was imperilled or impeded by the criticisms passed in Parliament or by the Home newspapers; nothing is known here of anything of the kind having occurred at any time. Does Sir Henry mean that Englishmen serving in India or retired Anglo-Indians alone are able to criticize or to pronounce an opinion upon Indian matters? If he means so, then the Secretary of State for India is not fit for his post. The days when the opinion of Indian civilians alone ruled Indian affairs in England have passed away, and the time for the sound principle of acquainting the English nation with Indian public opinion has arrived.

Mr. Maclean, M. P., denounced as a traitor to India.

11. The Gujarát Darpan (75), in its issue of the 9th May, writes:—See how men like Mr. Maclean, M.P., prove traitors to their once adopted country, where they have attained to the high positions they now occupy and amassed the wealth they enjoy. In the Asiatic Quarterly Review Mr. Maclean denounces the Indian National Congress outright and recommends the Indian Government to shut their schools and colleges, so that education, which, as he thinks, is at the root of all the troubles which they have to undergo, may be stopped and that he and his friends may have a free hand in doing what they want, specially what they want for Manchester. In making this recommendation he forgets that it is now as impossible to check education in India as to stop the course of the Ganges. Does he think that if Government stop giving education, which they will never do, the educated people of the country will not undertake it? He must blame God that he was not born earlier, or he would have advised Government not to introduce education in India at all.

Mr. Crawford's case in the House of Commons.

12. In noticing the telegram that Mr. A. Baumann, M. P., has given notice of a motion that the conduct of the Bombay Government in respect to the trial of Mr. A. T. Crawford has been unfair and vindictive and calls for the censure of the House of Commons, the Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 10th May, says:—Though some of the steps taken by the Bombay Government in connection with the enquiry into the charges made against Mr. Crawford were erroneous, yet it is not to be wished, nor is it likely, that the proposed motion will be adopted by a majority of the House of Commons. However, shrewd persons are of opinion that the House will sanction the payment of the large expenditure incurred by Mr. Crawford in his defence and a provision for his family. It is to be regretted that His Excellency Lord Reay should have allowed himself to be swayed by bad advice, put thereby the Indian treasury to a heavy drain, and should have given cause to complain against his otherwise good administration. The denunciation of the conduct of the Bombay Government in Mr. Baumann's motion as "vindictive" is very severe, but it is likely that Mr. Baumann will try to justify the use of that word by dwelling upon the refusal of the Bombay Government to adopt the decision arrived at by the Crawford Commission and to pay the costs incurred by Mr. Crawford in his defence when the Commission has declared him not guilty of all the charges save that of indebtedness. Mr. Baumann is likely to amplify upon the guarantee given by the Bombay Government to the self-incriminated Mámlatdárs. It is against sound principles of morality to permit a number of criminals to escape legal punishment and to retain them in the service in order to obtain the conviction of one criminal, and this conduct of the Bombay Government is quite indefensible. Much capital will be made out of the fact that the Bombay Government have as yet done nothing in regard to the guilty Mámlatdárs whom the Secretary of State for India wishes to get rid of even after paying some compensation to them, pointing out the same as a flagrant sign of the injustice done to Mr. Crawford. It is to be regretted that Lord Reay should have failed to lessen the sting of the erroneous steps taken by him in regard to the Crawford enquiry, so far as it lay in his power. [The Akhbáre Sodágar (87), in its issue of the same date, also says that there is little likelihood of Mr. Baumann's motion being passed by the House of Commons.]

Review of the Crawford case.

13. The Bakul (22), in its issue of the 5th May, thus reviews finally under separate headings the Crawford case :—I. The conduct of His Excellency Lord Reay.—Whatever may be the conduct of Lord Reay's Government as a whole, His Excellency Lord Reay personally will be remembered for a long time as the most sincere and courageous Governor Bombay has had. It argues no small courage to bring to light the irregularities and misconduct of an officer who was more than a Governor of Bombay. The result of the trial is also calculated to serve as a warning to many officers, Native and European, whose views of their official position and dignity are rather loose. His Excellency is therefore entitled to no small amount of praise for his fearless independence and devotion to duty. II. The prosecution and the evidence.—It is a mistake to suppose that the Crawford affair originated in the desire of Government to purify the service or that they considered that the claims of morality and justice demanded strict investigation. At the bottom of the painful case there lurks the desire of revenge. We have already exposed the one-sidedness and partiality shown by Government in conducting this case, and we need not repeat that here. That partiality has been the chief cause of the utter collapse of the prosecution aided by the carelessness of the principal witnesses on behalf of Government. From the nature of the evidence and the way in which it was given and the persons by whom it was given no other conclusion was possible than the one the Commissioners have arrived at. The theory of conspiracy which they conceived was also a possible way of explaining away the case, which was so full of gratuitous falsehoods and irreconcileable inconsistencies. It is no wonder, therefore, that the Commissioners laid stress on that theory. Many cases appear to us to have been manufactured specially to strengthen the prosecution—notably the Khárkar case. III. The Commission and the Commissioners.—We have no hesitation in saying that the Commissioners performed their difficult task with great credit, patience and justice for which they cannot be sufficiently thanked. Their task was painful in the extreme, but they did it in the most calm and dignified manner. If they occasionally showed some impatience, it was owing to the fussiness of the prosecution itself. We emphatically reject the opinion formed by the majority of the newspapers that the Commissioners were from the outset prejudiced in favour of Mr. Crawford. What better testimony of their freedom from prejudice can be given than their verdict on the count of Mr. Crawford's indebtedness. IV. The Bombay Government and Mr. Crawford.—The conduct of the Bombay Government in this case was essentially partial. We need not bring forward specific instances in support of our charge. Everybody knows how Government dealt with the accused in the matter of giving out the names of his accusers or declaring to him the counts on which he was going to be tried. The activity of Government in getting up evidence by means, fair or foul, is also too well-known to be specially detailed here. Yádavráo Sáthe gets promotion for his services to Government although the Government prosecutor establishes that he is the sub-agent of Hanmantráo. Binduráo Mámlatdár has been dismissed the service, simply because, we suspect, he had not the brazen-facedness to depose as Government wish. Is this partiality or impartiality ? Sir Raymond West's ill-fated minute, which is so loudly approved and about which songs of praise are being sung by the entire public press, shows unmistakably the animus of Government in the conduct of the case. In the first place, Sir Raymond had the misfortune to return to duty for the special purpose of writing this minute. In the second place, the honourable member says that the case was not perfectly understood or the evidence appreciated by the Commission. The Government Advocate General also, in the opinion of Sir R. West, did not fully understand the bearings of the case. If that was the case, why did not Sir R. West suggest to Government the propriety of securing the services of a better man than the Honourable Mr. Latham? Sir Raymond West has minutely criticised every case made by the prosecution against Mr. Crawford, but he has done so not as a judge but as an advocate. V. The decision of the Secretary of State for India.—We are perfectly satisfied with the conduct of the Secretary of State for India in the Crawford case. His Lordship was placed on the horns of a dilemma, but we are glad that he has given his support to the decision of the Commission. He knows the value of and what weight to attach to a body like the Commissioners, and his appreciation of their labours enhances their reputation in the thorough and patient sifting of the mass of evidence they had to deal with. Some newspapers say that His Lordship desired to please both the Government of Bombay and the Commissioners. We say that such a desire on the part of His Lordship does not show itself on reading the decision. The severe sentence which has been passed upon Mr. Crawford may be due perhaps to the amount of his indebtedness, to the obvious want of means at his disposal for paying his creditors and to the consequent natural inference that Mr. Crawford borrowed money without the intention of repaying it. These circumstances explain the harshness of the Secretary of State's decision in this painful case.

The minute of Sir R. West in the Crawford case criticised.

14. The Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 6th May, writes:—We have no desire whatever to criticise in detail the report of the Crawford Commission and the laborious minute of Sir R. West thereon. The more dispassionately these two documents are considered, the stronger must become the conviction that it would be impossible to find another document more deserving of being stigmatized as "an unjudicial denunciation" than the latter one. We may also add that, assuming that the case for the prosecution in respect of each and every article of charge under the heading of "corruption" was stated before the Commission as to all details exactly as it is believed to have occurred, Mr. Arthur Crawford must be honourably acquitted on the graver and more serious charge, as in fact he has been by the Commissioners, whose verdict the Secretary of State very properly declined to set aside at the invitation of the Bombay Government. Among the twenty-four cases of corruption fully gone into before the Commission there is one which according to our judgment, whatever view may be taken of it, is absolutely a trumped-up case. The case we are alluding to is that in which Mr. Arthur Crawford stood charged with having corruptly received Rs. 500 in June 1887 from Mr. Bápuji Mahipat Khárkar, then Deputy Assistant to the Commissioner, C. D., in the Alienation Department. We have no desire to multiply instances. It is enough to state here briefly that in the face of the evidence available it is difficult to accept the conclusions embodied in Sir R. West's minute. The only wonder is that so eminent a judge as he is known to be should have failed to properly appreciate the evidence.

15. The Gujarát Mitrá (78), in its issue of the 5th May, writes:—We regret we could not critically go over the comprehensive documents now published in the Crawford case; but we can have no doubt that history will pronounce the Honourable Sir R. West's minute to be more masterly and far more deserving of the two—the second one being the report of the Commission. If a mere glance can create such an impression, a full perusal is likely to enhance our admiration for the scrupulous care and stern justice which the Judicial member of Council has displayed in reviewing the Commissioners' report. In the latter Mr. Crawford has received the utmost benefits of 'not proven'—even going to the extent of honourable acquittal. Sir R. West, with a fuller knowledge, has gone behind the scenes and drawn his conclusions from an enormous mass of suspicions, uncertainties, and inconsistencies. We must as much lament as any proud civilian would that Mr. Crawford should have been judged by his own peers as one utterly unworthy of holding his covenant a day longer. But for his ability and popularity the public condemnation would have been unsparing.

16. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 9th May, writes:—With reference to the question of the subsistence allowance to Mr. Crawford, the London correspondent of the Bombay Gazette says: "I am informed that unless Lord Reay chooses to grant a subsistence allowance, the late Commissioner will not receive any pension." The wording is as vague as that of the despatch announcing Mr. Crawford's dismissal from the service. If we understand the above sentence aright, the question of pension in this matter depends upon the provision the local Government may make in the shape of a subsistence allowance. So that with the provision of a pension for Mr. Crawford there will be no practical difference between one who is innocent and one who is not so. The difference between a compassionate allowance and a pension is patent on the very face and ought to be no stepping-stone to an allowance to which Mr. Crawford even under Lord Cross's decision can have no right. The grant of a pension in the present case will be the obliteration of every landmark between good and bad service, and if, as we understand it, a subsistence allowance is to be converted into a pension, we ask the local Government to take steps not to allow any such thing and thereby destroy the good fruit of all their labours by putting Mr. Crawford upon the same level with those who have earned their pension by good and honest service.

The application of Mr. Crawford to Government for a reimbursement of the costs incurred by him in his defence considered a piece of brazen-faced impudence.

17. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 5th May, writes:—It is said that Mr. Crawford has applied to Government for a reimbursement of the costs incurred by him in defending himself before the Commission. In the Cambay case the costs of the accused were reimbursed by the Bombay Government. But the question is, are the two cases similar? In the Cambay case the verdict of the local authorities was entirely reversed; in this case it has been but partially reversed, and again even in reversing the verdict of the Bombay Government and holding up that of the special Commission on the main issues involved, the Secretary of State for India gives a plain hint that in his mind there is a moral conviction about the guilt of Mr. Crawford. It was only through a lucky chance—the ignorance of the Commissioners of local circumstances, of the local administrative system and their prejudice against the witnesses in this case based upon the guarantee of Government,—that Mr. Crawford escaped being convicted of the first thirty-two charges. His demand for costs we consider to be an act of brazen-faced impudence, quite in keeping with his behaviour all along. He has ruined many sávkárs knowingly and wilfully and now wants to be reimbursed at the cost of the poor rayat. We hope he will be told to hide his head in shame in a remote place and not to trouble Government or the public again with his offensive petitions.

The refusal of the Bombay Government to allow Mr. Crawford the costs of his defence before the Crawford Commission.

18. In alluding to the refusal of the Bombay Government to comply with the request made by Mr. Crawford through his solicitors to be allowed the heavy costs incurred by him in his defence, the Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 7th May, says:—There can be no question about the justice and propriety of the dismissal of Mr. Crawford from the service because it was he alone who brought the misfortune on himself, but the mode in which he has been deprived is objectionable. The erroneous steps taken by the Bombay Government in connection with the enquiry into the charges brought against Mr. Crawford illustrate how an officer of Government is ruined completely and what a heavy expenditure the Government treasury has to defray when he happens to incur the severe displeasure of the authorities. In Mr. Crawford's case the treasury had to spend upwards of three lákhs of rupees; Mr. Crawford, who was already steeped in debt over ears, had to spend a large amount of money in defending himself; much valuable time of several Government officers had to be spent upon the case; and, worst of all, the incriminated Mámlatdárs and others, who by their cool admission of giving bribes stigmatised the service to which they belonged and made themselves fit to be arraigned as criminals, should continue to draw their salaries month after month and should be entitled to draw it in future under a guarantee from Government. The indefensible mistakes committed by such a popular Governor as His Excellency Lord Reay are due to His Lordship's submitting to wrong advice. If Mr. Crawford personally pleads his cause and puts the case before the Secretary of State for India in proper light, there is probability of Lord Cross allowing him the costs of his defence.

The Mámlatdárs concerned in the Crawford case.

19. The Rást Goftár (82), in its issue of the 5th May, writes:—"What to do with the Mámlatdárs," is a question still agitating the public mind. Mr. Crawford has fallen, and deservedly; then should not those officials be made to share a similar fate for corrupting Mr. Crawford? Sir Raymond West has written a powerful minute, showing, in opposition to the views of the Commissioners, that the weight of the evidence went to establish the guilt of Mr. Crawford on the charges of corruption in the same way as on the charge of incurring debts within his own official jurisdiction. This appears, as we have already pointed out, to be the proper conclusion to be drawn from the evidence. But when the legal member of His Excellency the Governor's Council comes to speak upon the culpability of the Mámlatdárs, the reader feels that he speaks more like an advocate than a judge. The pleading is very vigorous and very able. But there appears to be an exaggeration of the virtues of the Bráhman character and an evident attempt to make light of its defects—defects great, deplorable, and perhaps ineradicable. "Nervous, acute, and almost preternaturally apprehensive of danger and disgrace, the official Bráhman of this presidency, though a first-rate public servant, usually makes a bad witness. His hesitation and apparent fencing with questions arise from a morbid prevision of traps and snares; they are frequently taken for indications of bad faith and create an evil impression on those whose liberality is not enlarged by experience." If Bráhman officials "are preternaturally apprehensive of danger and disgrace," surely prevarication and an obstinate fencing with questions are not the means of avoiding either the one or the other. When a witness deposes to certain statements, and when he tries to prop them up in cross-examination with absurd explanations, evasive answers, and a free use of the potential mood, he must know, acute and astute as he is, that he does not save, still less add to his reputation by refusing to be frank, honest and straightforward in his evidence. If Sir Raymond West does not dispute "the inherent frailties of the Native character," it must be painfully admitted that there are frailties peculiar to the Native character. But the learned exponent of the case for the Government fails to mention that these frailties appear in an exceedingly aggravated form in the Bráhman. But for their ready aiding and abetting, the wide-spread system of corruption would not have come into existence, nor would it have lasted so many years. They contributed materially to the establishment of "an almost universal moral collapse." Courage and a high sense of honour were stifled in them by the energetic and dominating personality of Mr. Crawford, the Commissioner, says Sir Raymond West. Are we to suppose that want of courage and a high sense of honour are not among the inherent frailties of the Native character? If Bráhman officials did possess courage and a high sense of honour, some of these gentlemen might be expected to have shown manly frankness before the Commission. Look at Mr. Pendse, a Master of Arts, occupying an honourable and responsible post under one of the Divisional Commissioners. He was the first important witness tendered by the prosecution, and evidently it was believed, of course in all sincerity, by the prosecution that his evidence would make a deep impression on the mind of the Commission. He appeared in the witness-box armed with tabular statements which he had prepared with the object of proving that Mr. Crawford was guilty of unjust supersessions and equally unjust promotions. Mr. Inverarity tore those statements to pieces. We do not envy Mr. Pendse the fiery ordeal which he had to pass through at the hands of that keen lawyer for four consecutive days. He made desperate attempts to wriggle out of the damaging statements to which he had boldly committed himself; but with each endeavour to extricate himself from his woful situation, he got himself more and more hopelessly entangled in it. The evidence did indeed make a deep impression on the minds of the Commissioners, but the impression it made was quite the other way. Mr. Pendse's evidence put Mr. Justice Wilson and his colleagues on their guard; and they afterwards grew so extremely chary of accepting anything that came from the prosecution that they became too suspicious of whatever evidence was given against Mr. Crawford. The collapse of Mr. Pendse tinged their minds, we are afraid, with a deep bias, and as Sir Raymond West has very truly observed, their conclusions rest on principles the general adoption of which would make convictions in the case of great official delinquents, if not all delinquents, almost hopeless. The case for the prosecution, taken as a whole, leads to the almost irresistible conclusion that there was corruption and not conspiracy. The Mámlatdárs who have confessed to their guilt have all committed a serious offence, to which is attached in each individual case a varying degree of culpability. The Government were, perhaps, a little too hasty in granting an universal indemnity to all and sundry who came forward "to make a clean breast of it." Pledges must be observed; but the public safety is the supreme law, as the Roman maxim goes, and accordingly the observance of those pledges cannot be made in utter disregard of the purity of the administration. It is mere folly or spite that can impute to Government any desire to shield the peccant Mámlatdárs at any cost. Government have placed themselves by their promises into a difficult position, though we have no doubt they can extricate themselves from it by reducing the givers of bribes to positions in which they can have the least opportunities of doing harm to the administration or throwing discredit upon it.

20. The Subodh Patrika (16), in its issue of the 5th May, writes:—The poor Mámlatdárs who appeared as witnesses in the Crawford case have suffered not a little. They were openly denounced in no measured terms by Anglo-Indian opponents of the enquiry, while a coterie of their own countrymen have been no less attentive, though in an underhand manner. But we are glad to see that the Honourable Sir R. West vindicates them in these words: "Public morality is in fact under a great obligation to these men, who in the face of obloquy, personal danger and humiliation have aided in unveiling a nefarious and destructive system of corruption." They ought no doubt to have abstained from any part in that system, but the next best thing in the true interests of the country and the Government was that they did admit and aid in unveiling it. It is not a little strange that shopkeepers and others who have been figuring as friends of equity and pure justice only since this enquiry began did nothing to denounce the nefarious practices which well nigh were killing that justice they love so much. If their object, however, be other than what is professed to be, they would only add to the open shame which they might think they would have prevented by hushing up the enquiry and suppressing truth.

Praise of His Excellency Lord Reay and a suggestion to the people to memorialize the Home Government to extend his term of office.

21. The Gujaráti (77), in its issue of the 5th May, writes:—His Excellency Lord Reay, like Lord Ripon, has succeeded in winning the hearts of the people in this presidency and become known throughout India as the most enlightened ruler that Bombay has had for a long time. His unflinching honesty and integrity, his genuine sympathy, the independence and simplicity of his character, and above all his sincerity and broad statesmanship have excited universal admiration. Months ago we suggested the desirability of memorialising the Secretary of State for India on the extension of his period of service, and we are glad that the Bombay Gazette, which has itself risen in public estimation by a just appreciation and recognition of the spirit of Lord Reay's administration, has supported the ardent desire of all classes of the people in that direction. The first two years of a new Governor are spent in learning the complexities of the administrative system, and it would be a public misfortune if an able, conscientious and sympathetic ruler were forced by the rules to retire just when he has acquired sufficient knowledge, experience and confidence to enable him to utilise his constructive statesmanship for the benefit of the people whose affections he has won by a wise administration of the affairs of his presidency. [The Kaiser-i-Hind (111) of the 5th and the Gujarát Gazette (76) of the 9th May also advise the people to memorialize the Home Government to extend His Excellency Lord Reay's term of office.]

The recent vacancy in the Panjáb Chief Court and a suggestion to give it to a Native.

22. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 4th May, writes:—Our friends of Lahore should take a lesson in humility from the manner in which the seat on the Chief Court to be temporarily vacated by Sir M. Plowden is going a-begging. Several gentlemen have already had the refusal of it, among others Mr. Hart, Chief Judge, Bombay Small Cause Court. So the kingdom of Bombay is resolved to maintain its superiority, since a Judge of the Small Cause Court in that city does not consider a Judgeship of the Panjáb Chief Court as a change for the better. Is it not time, by the way, that a Native Judge were found for the Lahore Chief Court? The public expected that Pandit Rámnáráin's appointment would be a precedent. Every High Court in India has one or more Native Judges. Lately there was a proposal to appoint a Native Judge for the Panjáb Chief Court also, but in the end it was shelved. The thing is so clear that the oversight would be soon rectified if it were pressed upon the attention of Government.

The separation of the judicial from the executive functions of Government officers considered necessary and Mr. Maclean's argument against it refuted.

23. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 5th May, writes:—The separation of the judicial from the executive functions of Government officers is as much calculated to lead the mofussil public to a taste of the true freedom of British rule as their combination serves to keep it practically ignorant of its beneficence. The main objection to this reform heretofore has been that it would entail additional expense; but the work in both branches has increased and is still increasing so much that, unless they are to be allowed to suffer grievously in their performance, the change must sooner or later be carried out. As fresh difficulty, however, has been raised by Mr. Maclean, M.P., that its adoption would render it impossible for Government to collect the revenue the idea might strike one as novel, but it is by no means original. It is only a small instance of what Sir J. Stephen pleaded for years ago, and it is based on the theory that the Indian subject of Her Majesty the Queen-Empress obeys her rule simply because by the bayonet which he sees underneath the cover of every order proceeding from it, and accordingly Mr. Maclean infers that the rayat pays the tax because the Mámlatdár who demands it has the criminal law in his hands to intimidate him into submission, not directly alone—for the tax-gatherer and his superiors have the stringent revenue laws to uphold their fiscal powers—but even indirectly as Magistrates, who might stretch or abuse their authority in the one line to ensure obedience in the other. At least we can see no other meaning in the objection. Now, to politicians who reason in this wise and disclaim all moral consideration as a basis of British rule over the country it is no use pointing out, as the Bombay Gazette does, that in the Native State of Travancore the judicial functions have been separated from the executive for the last two years, and neither its revenue collection nor its administration has come to a standstill. We might tell them, however, that not for two years but for two centuries, we believe, the practice they object to has existed in this town and island of Bombay, and we fancy in the other presidency capitals where all sorts of taxes—land tax, pension tax, license tax, income tax—and fees have been realised by the Collector, who has not the slightest magisterial powers; and what is practicable here within our municipal limits would be surely possible beyond them; and, indeed, some of the larger towns in the mofussil already have magisterial work taken away from their revenue authorities and no harm has followed. But more than all this, the municipal taxes are realised by an agency which is not even connected with Government. Mr. Maclean's objection, therefore, is based on a theoretic assumption which is contradicted by plain and practical facts, and thus it is devoid of all force.

The Bombay A'bkári Act and the case of Empress v. Tukárám Tátya.

24. The Rást Goftár (82), in its issue of the 5th May, writes:—The case of the Empress v. Tukárám Tátya, decided by the Bombay High Court on Thursday last, requires, we think, an immediate consideration of Section 53 of the Bombay A'bkári Act. The accused was arrested while openly carrying a quantity of mowra flowers along a public road near Bhiwndi, and was placed before a Magistrate on a charge of having the same in his possession for the purpose of illicit distillation of liquor. There was no evidence whatever for the prosecution of any intention to distil liquor. The accused in his defence said that he was taking the flowers to feed his cattle with. The Magistrate disbelieved this, and therefore thought that the clear object of the accused was to distil liquor, and summarily convicted him and fined him Rs. 100. There was no appeal from a summary conviction, and on an application being made on his behalf to the High Court Mr. Justice Scott and Mr. Justice Jardine refused to interfere. Under Section 53 of the A'bkári Act the burden of proving innocence was on the accused and the High Court held that a Magistrate might draw the inference of a guilty intention; and however wrong he might be in drawing it the Court would not interfere. If this be the state of the law, the sooner it is put an end to the better for the safety of Her Majesty's subjects.

The Bombay Government resolution on the income-tax report for 1887-88 criticized.

25. The Rájyabhakt (126), in its issue of the 7th May, says:—If the Bombay Government had in their resolution on the report of the working of the Income-tax Department in this presidency for 1887-88 added that a poll-tax should now be levied instead of the income-tax we would not have been displeased. The people have become destitute owing to the severity exercised by income-tax officers in collecting it, and still the Government indirectly blame them that they either do not properly assess the tax or reduce the assessment on appeal without sufficient enquiry. This clearly means that they should be more strict and squeeze the people as far as practicable. Such a policy is certainly reprehensible. There is nothing more painful than that Government should, regardless of the poor condition of the people, incur unnecessarily large expenditure and should resolve to squeeze them the more. It is not creditable to Government that they should act thus instead of reviving the duty on cotton goods imported into India and thereby increase the revenue. [The Gujarát Mitră (78), in its issue of the 5th May, observes that if the Bombay Government intend to realize more money from the mofussil as income-tax this year than hitherto, as recommended in their resolution on the working of the Income-tax Department, the people will have to suffer, and expresses surprise that Government still hope to increase the amount when some persons with small incomes have to pay more income-tax than what is properly due and when several who are not liable to it also pay it. The Gujaráti (77), in its issue of the 5th May, says that the income-tax is very unpopular and so when the Government exercise pressure upon their officers to increase the amount of the collections therefrom instead of advising them to act with mildness and amity, the former are to blame for the severity exercised by the income-tax collectors. The Yajdán Parast (141), in its issue of the 5th May, remarks that credit is due to Mr. Kharsedji Nasarvánji Sirvai, the Income-tax Collector, for the satisfactory working of the income-tax in Bombay.]

Complaint against Mr. P. S. V. FitzGerald, Acting Second Assistant to the Political Agent, Káthiáwár.

26. The Rájyabhakt (126), in its issue of the 7th May, says:—We know Mr. P. S. V. FitzGerald, Acting Second Assistant to the Political Agent, Káthiáwár, from the time he was in Gohelvád. We have seen him hearing the talk going on in the houses of Vakils by standing near the windows late at night. He has become a lord in Káthiáwár, and he is given to pleasure, from which he has no time to spare and does not dispense justice in time. It is feared that this will give rise to something very serious. For some time past a dispute has taken place between the Dhrol Darbár and the Sumrás about the possession of some land. Though the Bombay Government have issued a resolution in favour of the Sumrás it has not yet been enforced. The Dhrol Darbár harasses these helpless men and justice is not to be had from Mr. FitzGerald. What are they to do now? Should they starve or draw the sword? The Bombay Government are anxious to arrest outlaws, but they should also be anxious not to give rise to outlawry. This can be done by ordering a Nawáb like Mr. FitzGerald to dispense justice speedily. Mr. FitzGerald keeps his subordinates in office till a late hour and is still unable to do anything. This is a strong proof of his high-handed conduct.

Complaint against Captain Kennedy, Acting Third Assistant to the Political Agent, Káthiáwár, and Mr. Keshavlál Pránjivan, Judge of Vasávad.

27. The same newspaper expresses a wish that an explanation regarding the complaints recently made by it against Captain Kennedy, Acting Third Assistant to the Political Agent, Káthiáwár, should be published, complains against the continuance in office of Mr. Keshavlál Pránjivan as Nyáyádhish (Judge) of Vasávad, he having been pronounced unfit for the post by Colonel Phillips, then an Assistant to the Political Agent, in an order No. 678, dated 5th September 1877, and asks whether it is through the Captain's favour or that of his Shirastedár, Mr. Vithalrái, or that of some other person that he continues to hold it still. The paper quotes from the above-mentioned order No. 678 of Colonel Phillips, and observes:—Colonel Phillips had Mr. Keshavlál removed from the post, the place being given to Mr. Manishankar. What is the reason then for Mr. Keshavlál re-securing the appointment? What can be said about Captain Kennedy allowing such a person to continue in the post? What guarantee is there that Mr. Keshavlál, who is known to have done injustice out of animosity, is not still harassing his enemies? Is the favour of the Political Agent or his Shirastedár to be secured for nothing? It is necessary that Government should call for an explanation from Captain Kennedy in this matter. We wish that Government should do the needful in this matter and save the people of Vasávad from injustice.

Mr. Murzban, Assistant District Traffic Superintendent, North-Western Railway, and his petition to the Government of India.

28. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 1st May, writes:—Mr. M. M. Murzban, who will be well remembered in Karáchi on account of his fiery fearlessness in the local municipal corporation, has approached the Government of India with a petition which has attracted some attention. Mr. Murzban is an Assistant District Traffic Superintendent on the North-Western Railway and has been repeatedly overlooked on occasions of promotion, his claims being ignored. Against this he appealed to the Director with the result that his promotion was stopped for a year. He protested again and was served with three months' notice of termination of service. At Quetta Mr. Murzban assaulted a clerk and this gave a good handle to such of his superior officers as wanted to bring him into trouble. If the Government of India go into his case with an unprejudiced mind it will be perhaps found that his case is really a hard one. Mr. Murzban is a young man and has many defects of character as such. He is very hot-tempered, too easily provoked, and probably not yet well-trained to the departmental harness. But the bad treatment he has met with is entirely due to his independence of character. There can be no question as to his capacity or energy. The Civil and Military Gazette, acting no doubt upon the information placed in its hands, has been trying to prejudice Mr. Murzban's case, but the latter would have been better advised if he had not placed himself upon his defence in the columns of that paper. If anything, the Lahore paper would have done him some service. It would have shown the systematic attempts made to run Mr. Murzban down, not only in the department but outside of it. The Government, if they determine to make an inquiry, would not be led away by any special pleading. We should be very much pleased if Government could for once break through the despotism of departments. We should be glad not only for Mr. Murzban's sake, but because it would be a good precedent and may be of help to others who may be placed in the same position.

Complaint regarding the indifference of Government towards the Kánarese language.

29. The Havyak Subodh (144), in its issue of the 7th May, complains about the indifference of Government towards the Kánarese language and says that it would have been an encouragement to the Kánarese if Ráo Sáheb R. B. Karandikar had been appointed Acting Reporter on the Native Press, as he knows all the languages of this presidency and is an able officer.

The inefficiency of the Poona police.

30. The Poona Vaibhav (48) of the 8th May complains that thefts are rife in Poona in the Sadáshiv and Náráyan Peths, and remarks that the inefficiency of the police force is apparent from such frequent occurrences and that the bad lighting arrangements of the local municipality also aid the thieves in effecting their purposes secretly.

Encroachments upon the public roads in Mahudha and the inaction of the local police.

31. The Svadesh Bandhu (136) of Mahudha, in its issue of the 8th May complains of the people freely and fearlessly encroaching upon the public roads in that town and of neither the police pátil nor the chief constable stopping them, draws the attention of Mr. Benjamin Robertson, Assistant Collector and Magistrate, Kaira, to the matter, and adds that these encroachments are unprecedented in the town.

Sweating of rupees in Broach and the local police.

32. The Din Mani (73) of Broach, in its issue of the 7th May, says that some rogues in that town practise sweating of rupees, that they passed off some sweated rupees on some shroff there but were detected, that the matter was hushed up by some persons taking a bribe, regrets that the police do not attend to it and calls upon them to make an enquiry.

Part II.—Legislation.

Bill for the proper administration of property held in trust for charitable purposes approved.

33. The Jáme Jamshed (108) of the 11th May is glad to find that a Bill to provide for the proper administration of property held in trust for charitable purposes is to be shortly introduced into the Supreme Legislative Council, observing that the public has been long demanding the enactment of such a measure the necessity for which is felt both at the presidency towns and in the different districts throughout the whole country and the appearance of which will be hailed with joy from all quarters, and expresses a hope that the law will be so framed as to avoid hurting the feelings of the Native population.

Part III.—Education.

The management at the Rájkumár College, Rájkot, considered very defective.

34. The Rájyabhakt (126), in its issue of the 7th May, writes:—Enough has, we think, been said of late about the Rájkumár College, Rájkot, in successive issues of our paper. We have shown beyond the shadow of a doubt how it has fallen short of the object which led to its foundation. We only wonder how in face of this unsatisfactory state of things the authorities should be content with what imperfect schooling it continues to give. It is this which obliges Government from time to time to interfere in State matters when such poorly educated Chiefs are at the head of their States. The existing imperfections are believed to be due to the total want of requisite supervision. Higher education is unknown in it, and the khatpat of the College authorities has made it a semi-political department. There exist no settled rules to guide their actions, and undue advantage is being taken over minor Chiefs. Tutors are forcibly attached to some Kumárs by Europeans when it is authoritatively declared that they are a mere useless burden on the States concerned. The Principal is too old to devise the necessary reforms and to enforce them. An unnecessarily heavy and rotten staff is being maintained to teach a handful of Kumárs, and the matter goes on unquestioned since a long time. We hope Government, which have the highest good of the Kumárs at heart, will take speedy measures, without regard to any individual interest, for putting the College on a secure and satisfactory basis.

Part IV.—Railways.

The decision in the Golden Gang cases and the lax management of the G. I. P. Railway Company.

35. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 6th May, writes:—At the last Criminal Sessions of the Bombay High Court, among other cases of interest, the Golden Gang cases were disposed of. One of the prisoners, Neile, has been convicted and sentenced to six years' hard labour. The two others, Spink and Sterling, have got off. The decision is not, we are afraid, likely to be reassuring to the travelling public whom it particularly concerns. The story of organized robbery which the guard Neile relates shows the scope and extent of the depredations to have been on a much larger scale than could be compassed by one man, and the discharge of the other two prisoners leaves an impression that the crime has not been purged and fully sifted to the core and that some dangerous characters are still abroad. Let us hope, however, that the disclosures will put the authorities of the G. I. P. Railway Company on their guard and induce them to take stricter measures for the safety of the goods committed to their charge. The G. I. P. Railway Company is particularly noted for its indifference to the comfort of passengers, and the present disclosures show that its discipline in regard to its European employés is very lax. The present management of the Company has a special partiality for European and Eurasian employés, however ill-bred, and is specially rough on its Native employés, however estimable. Let us hope that the disclosures of the Golden Gang cases will teach the Company a lesson and will induce it to alter its method of management.

PART V.—Municipalities.

Proposed curtailment of State support to charitable dispensaries disapproved.

36. The Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 6th May, observes:—The evil effects of the erroneous financial policy of the Government of India are becoming more glaring day by day. A large portion of the public revenues is frittered away on military expenses and defence works, neglecting such works as are intimately connected with the well-being and prosperity of the people. The educational grant has, in proportion to the need, been stinted, seriously crippling the spread of education. And now an attempt is being made to transfer a portion of the cost of the maintenance of charitable dispensaries to municipal treasuries and local funds, which will have in the end to bear the entire cost of these institutions. The district municipalities and local boards are still in their infancy, with a weak financial position, and have to perform various important duties that have already necessitated an increase in the municipal and local fund taxes. At such a time as this the transfer of a portion even of the cost of dispensaries would be very crushing to the municipal and local funds. Educational and charitable medical institutions concern the vital interests of the people and every civilised Government considers its sacred duty to maintain them from imperial funds, while the British Indian Government is, it is to be regretted, trying to get rid of them. [The Satyavakta (129) of the 10th and the Suryá Prakásh (84) of the 4th May take a similar view.]

The strike of the Bombay gáriwállás and the local municipality.

37. The Din Bandhu (7), in its issue of the 5th May, writes:—The strike of the gáriwállás in Bombay and its successful issue show the strength that lies in union under a well-organized combination for defending interests unjustly attacked. The hack-drivers had a strong grievance against the municipality, which, to add to the burden of heavy taxation under which the poor men laboured, demanded the tax in advance. We are given to understand that hack conveyances even in rich London are more lightly taxed than in Bombay. Is this because the gáriwállás here are better off, or is it because Bombay is richer than London, or is it because the municipality here is poor? It is for none of these causes, but because the majority of the representatives of the ratepayers in the Municipal Corporation are there more for the honour of the thing than for watching the interests of their constituents. Were it otherwise we would see the numerous vexatious and oppressive taxes under which the poor suffer soon removed and the extravagance of the municipality considerably restrained.

38. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 4th May, writes:—Reading an account of the strike among the gáriwállás of Bombay we are most impressed by the fact how little men who call themselves the representatives of these classes in the municipalities know about them. We have a vivid recollection of a municipal election in this city in which a candidate attributed his defeat to the votes of the gáriwállás being ranged against him. Of course the gáriwállás are poor and unintelligent, but it is not our experience that they exercise their franchise with less intelligence than other people who are expected to understand what a right of vote implies. The gáriwállás may be very despicable, but it will no longer be denied that they are a power in the land. In Bombay they struck work for two days and the whole traffic was paralysed, ships were detained in the harbour, and there was something like a strike even on the railways. But the municipality, before framing the new rules for collecting license-fees, does not seem to have made any inquiries as to whether these would be acceptable to the gáriwállás or whether there would be any opposition. Even when the men refused to pay, the offended dignity of the civic fathers was promptly vindicated by the police, and the prospect of a strike does not appear to have caused any anxiety to the municipality. But the mischief was so wide-reaching in its consequences that the Municipal Corporation was rudely aroused from the sense of its security and dignity and had no other alternative than to confess its error and to eat the humble pie. There are many other municipalities which are in more urgent need of such a lesson than the Bombay Municipality, and a little more unanimity among the rate-payers would not fail to have the desired effect.

The resolution of the Government of Bombay anent the corruption in municipal elections at Poona disapproved.

39. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 1st May, writes:—We are doubtful whether the resolution of the Bombay Government on the Poona municipal elections is a wise pronouncement. Government were informed that corrupt practices were resorted to during the recent elections at Poona, and on the strength of this information this resolution has been issued. It seems like passing an ex-parte judgment. The only information that could reach the Government must have been the official information, which is often very far from being infallible. To pronounce judgment publicly upon such evidence does not seem to be in accordance with the principles of strict justice, and it is no wonder that the remarks of Government have caused some excitement in Poona. At every municipal election one hears of corrupt practices more or less, but neither at Poona nor anywhere else is there any means of judging how far these reports are true. The District Magistrate of one district or some other officer may have stronger feelings on such a subject than another officer in a similar position and may report more strongly to Government, but that is scarcely any reason why Government should publicly rebuke a public body without further inquiries. Besides, if there is corruption, reams of Government resolutions would not have any effect. Since elections have been introduced in India legislation may also follow on the lines of the Corrupt Practices Act in England. That would be the only effective restraint on corruption. A Government resolution based on the information of some local officer or officers is manifestly unjust and wholly ineffective.

40. The Sind Times (5), in its issue of the 1st May, writes:—The Bombay Government, having in view certain recent occurrences at Poona, have issued a resolution on the subject of bribery at municipal elections. It is hoped that among a community so intelligent, public opinion will arise against the practice that will make legislative interference unnecessary. Certainly, it is a sign of advancing intelligence in one direction that it should be found worth while to resort to underhand practices at all in the matter of municipal elections; but whether that measure of enlightenment will never expand into the higher consciousness which the Bombay Government hope for seems more doubtful. Unfortunately the most striking characteristic of English civilisation as grafted upon the Indian temperament is that apart from individual exceptions it appears to stimulate the intelligence at the expense of the sense of morality and obligation rather than otherwise.

The Thána Municipality and its official president.

41. The Arunodayă (20), in its issue of the 5th May, says:—If our rulers really wish that local self-government should succeed in India, the sooner they dispense with Collector or official presidents the better. Experience has often shown that these official presidents are an impediment to the success of the scheme nobly introduced by Lord Ripon. An instance as to how these officials behave has recently occurred at Thána. In the matter of considering the representations of the people of Thána as regards the octroi duties the Huzur Deputy Collector, who is the president of the local municipality, has acted in a most objectionable way. Instead of considering the representations of the people in a calm and dignified manner the Huzur Deputy Collector has so far forgotten himself as to force his own views on the municipality in this matter. The paper then makes out four points against the official president of the Thána Municipality, namely, firstly, at the meeting convened for considering the people's petition it was resolved by a majority of the members of the municipality that the octroi duties should not be levied, but the president reported to Government that the matter was not disposed of at the meeting although as a matter of fact it was finally disposed of. Secondly, it was resolved by a majority of votes that the expenditure of the municipality should be reduced and a committee was therefore appointed to report as to where and how the expenditure was susceptible of reduction. The report of this special committee ought to have been accepted by the president, but he did not do so and laid the whole matter again before the municipality. Thirdly, the resolution of the majority that the octroi duties should not be levied is considered to be illegal by the president, which he has no authority to do. Fourthly, the Huzur Deputy Collector asks Government sanction for the imposition of the octroi duties, which it was not necessary to do and which is ultra vires. The paper adds :—We cannot sufficiently condemn the obstinate spirit shown by the official president in this matter. It has compelled us to resort to law and landed us in much expense and waste of time and worry. We hope the Government will speedily inquire into this matter. It is not difficult to administer the affairs of a small city like Thána. Government should therefore not hesitate to appoint non-official presidents who may be able to perform the duties of the office of president.

Cholera in Surat and the indifference of the local municipality.

42. The Gujarát Darpan (75), in its issue of the 9th May, writes :—It is much to be regretted that while Surat has suffered so much from devastating fires, there has been a laxity of lookout after cholera. Not only no peremptory steps have been taken against its progress, but in fact no satisfactory notice has been taken of the cholera cases. Cholera now seems to have assumed a very grave aspect. So long as it was confined to detached portions no great danger was apprehended, but now it calls for great promptitude from the municipality as well as the police. In the single building of Bálkrishnáji's Mandir there have been over ten cases of cholera of which three have already proved fatal. In the interest of the Vaishnavas we request Maháráj Maganlálji to take immediate steps to check the epidemic and to adopt such means as would effectually stop its spread outside. We think it also necessary for the public safety that the Darshans should be altogether stopped for some days. The Government authorities ought to stop them in case the people do not do so of their own accord. It is disgraceful to the municipality that it should not have yet turned its attention to the large khálkuwa (underground cess-pool) behind the Mandir. [The Suryă Prakásh (84), in its issue of the 4th May, says that though about 400 deaths have occurred from cholera in Surat during March and April last the municipality has not taken prompt measures to check it, that it has even given up using disinfecting powder, that it is necessary that another doctor be appointed by the municipality to treat cholera patients, and that the Government authorities ought also to do the needful in the matter.]

The appointment of a municipal committee at Rájkot approved.

43. The Káthiáwár Times (81), in its issue of the 8th May, writes :—The appointment of a municipal committee in Rájkot is a veritable mark of progress in this province. The committee held its preliminary meeting on Monday last, when all the members except two were present. Judging from the way in which several important questions were discussed and dealt with we can safely conclude that the Rájkot Municipality will prove a very useful institution. It is pleasing to notice that the committee began its work in right earnest. The resolution that the president should write to the Political Agent to expedite the plans and estimates of the proposed water-works will be much appreciated by the public, as it shows that now the problem of a permanent source of water-supply in the civil station will be faced practically.

The proposed new appointments in the Karáchi Municipality.

44. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 1st May, writes :—The two appointments proposed by the Karáchi Municipality are known to the public. There is a third one to be added. It is proposed to have an auditor on Rs. 300 a month. Thus three new appointments are proposed to be created; a health officer on Rs. 350 a month, an auditor on Rs. 300 a month, and a superintendent of gardens on Rs. 150 a month besides an allowance. Has the income of the municipality so largely increased as to justify such a heavy additional cost in the keeping of accounts? The present ratio of the cost of the establishment to the income is about 50 per cent. The rate at which new appointments are being created, without any one knowing whether they are wanted or not, bids fair to swallow up the greater part of the income. One might reasonably hope that the percentage of the cost of the establishment would not be allowed to go beyond a certain maximum limit, but that is about the last thing which occurs to the Karáchi Municipality. Whatever else may be said of them, there can be scarcely any doubt that the periodical distribution of patronage serves as a powerful stimulant to the much-lauded public spirit and intelligence of our municipal commissioners.

Diwán Sáhijrám combining in himself four duties and the necessity for relieving him of his duties as Secretary, Shikárpur Municipality.

45. The same newspaper writes:—Unless it is intended to perpetuate a public scandal, Diwán Sáhijrám must be relieved of his duties as Secretary of the Shikárpur Municipality without any delay. That the same officer should be Town Magistrate, Income-tax Collector, Chairman of the Municipal Managing Committee, and Secretary to the Municipality is an instance of palpable inequity which carries its own condemnation. But consideration for the energy of a single man demands that Mr. Sáhijrám should not be made to do the work of four. He is not at all responsible for the position in which he has been placed and we have never received any complaint against him, but in the name of equity and humanity we earnestly ask that he may be relieved from his present embarrassing position as he is unequal to the extra work he has to do and as his different duties conflict with one another.

The abolition of scholarships by the Tatta Municipality disapproved.

46. A correspondent of the Sind Times (5), in its issue of the 1st May, writes:—A few days ago there appeared a paragraph in the Phœnix referring to the measure which the municipality of the ancient town of Tatta was contemplating of imposing a house-tax on the people, in a town where in many cases owners of houses would be only too thankful to tenants who would occupy them. But there is also another measure in contemplation by the city fathers, which though looked at from the point of view of hard profit and loss, is altogether inexcusable. I allude to the step which the municipality is about to take of stopping the two or three scholarships of the value of Rs. 6 each conferred upon poor Tatta students who proceed to Karáchi to complete their school education after passing the fifth standard in the local Anglo-Vernacular School. It speaks very unfavourably for the good sense of the municipality to apply its shears of retrenchment to education when other municipalities in this province are opening their purses liberally for it. It is notorious that the people of Tatta do not yet thoroughly appreciate the benefits of education, and in the light of this fact the contemplated step of the municipality is not only a retrograde movement, but suicidal in its consequences. I hope, therefore, that in the interests of such a commendable object as the spread of education amongst backward communities you will throw the weight of your powerful voice on the side of the poor students of Tatta.

PART VI.—Native States.

The scheme for the utilization of the armies of Native States for Imperial defence commented upon.

47. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 5th May, writes:—It is well-known that before leaving India Lord Dufferin, in a speech at Patiala, gave the Indian public what may be called the crude basis of a scheme for the utilization of the offers of Native States made when the north-western frontier was threatened with a further advance of the Russian army in the direction of Herat and Kandahar, though the threatened danger like all others of its kind has passed away and to all appearance there is nothing to fear from in the north. The offers of the Native States did not escape attention, but after mature deliberation, both here and in England, took shape and the Government of India deputed Major Mellis to examine the question of such utilization by a personal inspection of the armies of the States. Major Mellis seems to have visited almost all the Rajput States, and those in the Panjáb, and is now said to be in Kashmir studying the same question. Lord Dufferin has given the scheme a shape and it will now rest with His Excellency Lord Lansdowne to mature and perfect it. Its details are not known, but, we believe, only a certain proportion of the States' armies is to be disciplined after the British model and called upon for service when necessary. Already some of the Native Princes have taken advantage of the ex-Viceroy's announcement and begun the work of reorganization in all earnestness. The Chiefs have shown unswerving loyalty in this matter, but the paramount power has been to a certain extent unnecessarily reticent. Moreover, some unnecessary uneasiness has been caused in some quarters owing to the Government selection of the Princes of the north alone in this connection. Perhaps the selection may be intended to encourage a spirit of honourable rivalry in those to whom Government have not applied for such help. It appears that the scheme is being developed. Recently the Commander-in-Chief of India, while on a visit to Jodhpore, gave expression to these feelings in regard to the same question. Though Sir Roberts could not go beyond the conventionalities of political reticence, there is a ring of significant determination about his expressions that forces on the conviction that the actual formation of army corps of Native States' armies is not far distant. How the armies are to be officered, whether they are to be actually absorbed in the British standing army, or, while belonging to the respective States, are to be called upon when required to join the British army, are questions which His Excellency did not condescend to go into. We are persuaded to think that the Commander-in-Chief would have done well to break through the stiffness of official etiquette and take into confidence the Jodhpore Mahárája as a representative Rajput who is so vitally concerned in the question. Though sincerely admiring the spirit in which His Excellency complimented the Ráthores for their gallantry as soldiers, we cannot but regret that the formal compliment was but a hollow consolation to brave hearts. The study of Todd's Rájasthán will tell any one who cares to read those useful volumes seriously that as to bravery the Rajputs, be they Ráthores or others, are second to none in any country in the world, but their bravery, without a wide field for its use, makes its possessor a mere mockery—nay, the very sink of death—and often shoots out into directions that invariably prove mischievous. During the last Afghan war the troops of the Panjáb Chiefs were used for garrison purposes on the frontiers, and though garrison duties by themselves may be an acknowledgment of their capacity for military work, to brave people like the Rajputs, these duties were but the inadequate recognition of their ambition. What we would advocate is the despatch of these soldiers to the very field of action to prove what stuff there is in them. Wherever they have gone they have returned with glory, and there is no doubt as to their capacity to fight the Cossack as nobly as they did the Afghan or the Egyptian lately. To make the States' armies a living reality, what is most urgently wanted is the establishment of military schools in the provinces with a small military college at their head. We do not wish to advocate any wild scheme; it has the sanction of a British Commander in this country. And a scheme for the organization of the States' armies involves the question of officers which can be solved without detriment to the sovereign rights of the princes by officering their armies with officers from the States themselves. The feasibility of the question of throwing open the military service to scions of the nobility has been admitted on all hands, though it has never been given a practical turn. To them the duties of an administration are drudgery, and not competent to gratify their military ambition. It is for the training of these men that an Indian Sandhurst is so much needed, its utility having been already recognised. If we are not mistaken, a scheme to that effect had been before the military authorities, but what turn it has taken we do not know. We know that while still the Covenanted Civil Service of India is practically a close service to the people of this country, it is quite impossible to expect the military service to be thrown open to them. Be that as it may, the question of the utilization of the Native States' armies does involve the question of the establishment of a military college we have adverted to above. We hope that when this question of the Native States' armies is before His Excellency the Viceroy, he will give due consideration to this subject also.

The deficit in the Hyderabad budget and the thoughtlessness of the pecuniary offer made to the Government by His Highness the Nizám.

48. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 5th May, writes:—A deficit of nearly one-fourth of a kror of rupees in the budget of the State of Hyderabad, the revenues of which average only three krors a year and which does not concern itself with public works of a permanent character or reproductive nature, is a serious occurrence, of which the only relieving feature is its frank avowal and wise publication. It also shows, as a contemporary has well observed, the extreme thoughtlessness of the offer of a pecuniary contribution which His Highness the Nizám was induced to make to the Government of India the year before the last. Such a proposal was not called for by any sense of duty and ought to have been repressed by a sense of propriety; and it was no wonder that Lord Dufferin declined it with a grace his suavity could command. But we think a little frankness of expression on His Lordship's part would have been suitable and would have proved more instructive as a guide to the Native Princes generally. Our Princes have their treaty obligations towards the paramount power, and these they cannot too faithfully carry out and adhere to; and further, in times of internal disorder or foreign invasion they are bound to aid and co-operate with it to the utmost of their resources. But outside those limits their help to Government must be moral and not material in any shape, which latter they in justice are bound to reserve for the benefit of the toilers in their dominions—and which, indeed, is the chief happiness of the subjects of the Native States. Neither therefore the Native Princes nor the British political officers, who set any value on their right relations with the Supreme Government, ought to countenance in any shape such a course as that involved in the Nizám's offer to the Government of India. Nor can all the treasures of all the Native States help to relieve its pecuniary wants except for a time. The financial difficulties of the Government of India are simply co-extensive with its expanding empire, and the former can be effectually met only by the power which controls the latter—the Government in England. For any Native Prince to try to dabble with them is both futile and improper. It has not even a decent look.

49. The Káthiáwár Times (87), in its issue of the 5th May, refers to the present state of affairs at Indore and says:—It is time that the relations of the feudatory States of India with the British Government should be distinctly defined afresh, as some of them under the false impression that they are independent chiefs and amenable to no authority foolishly seem to commit endless zulum upon their relatives and subjects at the instigation of selfish and rascally Kámdárs. It is a lamentable fact that the principles which should guide the Native administrations have never been formally enunciated in any one State paper and the chiefs have never been told to adopt a distinctly specified line of policy. The chiefs, save a few honourable exceptions, appear to be utterly unfit to rule. They leave the management of their States to designing men and plunge themselves headlong into the abyss of indolence and vice, where they remain till they find that their sanads are cancelled and their rules are at an end. It was, we believe, Lord Dufferin who said that all the territories of the Native Princes and chiefs were governed despotically, though there existed varieties in their constitutional arrangements. This is undeniably true. Good and sensible people would certainly prefer the law-regulated rule of the British Government to the arbitrary administration of Native chiefs. Can we not change this all? Most decidedly. By a change in the form of government all these obliquities could be obviated. We must remove cringing courtiers and pig-headed advisers who play on the chiefs' weaknesses and encourage every vice in them. The internal administration of the States must undergo a thorough overhauling. Despotic rules can only give way to law-regulated rules by the adoption of constitutional governments in Native States such as the Council of Administration introduced into his State by the Bhávnagar Darbár. A scheme for constitutional government for Native States should be forthwith propounded and the chiefs asked to adopt it. Unless and until this is done and the personal caprices of rulers and Kámdárs are checked, Native States are not likely to cast off the skin of anarchy.

The annual excursions of the Native Rájás to the hills disapproved.

50. The Suryodayă (63), in its issue of the 6th May, writes:—We often criticise the practice of our rulers in carrying on the work of government from the hills and we are joined by some sensible Anglo-Indian newspapers in our condemnation of this practice. But we are extremely sorry to see that Government do not find it possible and convenient to work on the plains. The practice instead of being abandoned is being continually adopted and it has set a bad example to our Native rulers and chiefs, many of whom now leave their charges to their officials and enjoy the cool breezes of Mahábaleshvar or the Neilghiris without regard to the welfare or wants of the people over whom they rule and with whose hard-saved money they deal so liberally. It is time our Native Rájas and chiefs know their duties towards their people well and discontinue their pleasure-trips bought at the cost of immense money and the serious inconvenience of many millions of people.

The people and the Native States of Káthiáwár and a petition prepared by the editor and proprietor of the Rájyabhakt newspaper for presentation to His Excellency Lord Reay on their behalf.

51. The Rájyabhakt (126), in its issue of the 7th May, gives a further instalment of the petition prepared by its editor and proprietor for presentation to His Excellency Lord Reay on behalf of the people and Native Princes of Káthiáwár, takes the Government Political Department in hand, says that the Political Agents, the Kárbháris of Native States, and the education imparted to the Princes in the Rájkumár College are the sources of the latter's misconduct, helplessness and incapacity, requests Government to give better instruction to the Princes in the Rájkumár College, and quotes Colonel Osborne on the conduct of the Political Agent and the Kárbháris in support of its views. It adds that it is necessary that Government should order an enquiry into the working of the Political Department as the Political Agents themselves are steeped in vices and as they, through the Kárbháris thrust on Native States by them, purposely lead the Princes to a vicious course in order that nobody may complain against them, that such a course is doubly beneficial to the Political Agents, as the Princes cannot raise their heads against them and as they can fulfil their object by keeping the Princes under their pressure, and that the selfish conduct of the Political Department is a cause of the setting up of false heirs by the Native Princes.

Contemplated deprivation of powers of a petty Rajput tálukdár in Hálár complained against.

52. The same newspaper writes:—A Rajput tálukdár of a petty girás in Hálár is about to be deprived of his powers on the charge of mismanagement, as two dead bodies were found near the borders of one of his villages. If this can be called mismanagement and if it be just to deprive the tálukdár of his powers for it, why did not the authorities take notice of the serious want of management at Rájkot last year when the sepoy Kálukhán ran amuck and killed ten persons and injured others in broad daylight, Colonel Wodehouse being Acting Political Agent at the time? What is to be thought of charges being thus preferred against poor tálukdárs? Is not this "political justice" in Káthiáwár? Can the thief fine the Magistrate?

The Honourable Mr. Richey and the appointment of a member of Mr. Maganbhái Hathibhái's family as tutor to a petty tálukdár in Káthiáwár.

53. The same newspaper says:—The Honourable Mr. Richey has used his influence in getting a member of the family of Mr. Maganbhái Hathibhái of Ahmedabad, which he knew while he was Collector of that town, appointed tutor to a Prince of a petty táluka in Káthiáwár managed by Government, on a salary of Rs. 110 per mensem. This man helps the officers in harassing the royal family, with which they are at enmity. Is it just that the Political Agency should thus waste money because it has the treasury of the táluka in question under its charge? How very likely it is that great injustice would be done by the Honourable Mr. Richey using his influence in Káthiáwár against the táluka! Cannot the Honourable Mr. Richey get this Ahmedabadi appointed somewhere else? Could he not have secured a post for him in a large State? We do not approve of Mr. Richey's action in the matter, and hope that a just man like him will not delay correcting this mistake. The rotten Political Department in Káthiáwár and the Bombay Government allow such mismanagement to continue. Where has the pride of justice entertained by Europeans gone?

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

The proposed appointment of an Excise Commissioner with the Government of India disapproved.

1. In alluding to the report that the Home authorities favour the creation of an Excise Commissioner with the Government of India to regulate the ábkári policy, the Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 15th May, says:—There are already too many highly-paid offices in India and there is no need whatever of an Excise Commissioner with the Supreme Government. The Commissioner is certain to increase the ábkári revenue in order to show the necessity for keeping up his office. The reform much needed in the present ábkári policy is the declaration that an increase of the ábkári revenue is not sought, that the consumption of spirituous drinks should be lessened at all sacrifices, that toddy should be freed from all restraints as its wide consumption is sure to lessen the use of liquor, that no unnecessary restraints should be imposed on pure country liquor, and that due caution should be exercised to prevent the importation of inferior spirituous drinks from the continent of Europe. If proper measures to bring about the above-described results are taken, no fear need be entertained of the vice of intoxication increasing in India.

Mr. Smith, M. P.'s motion condemning the opium monopoly of the Indian Government disapproved.

2. The Gujarát Darpan (75), in its issue of the 12th May, writes:—For the good fortune of the Indian Government, Mr. Samuel Smith's motion condemning its opium monopoly does not meet with the same success as did that for the ábkári system. The shutting of this source of revenue would mean a loss of eight or nine krors of rupees annually, which the Government cannot well forego in its present financial state on merely sentimental grounds without bringing itself on the verge of bankruptcy and utter collapse. Though of late years there has been an incessant falling off in this revenue on account of a decrease of the traffic and the growing liking for indigenous drug among the Chinese, the sacrifice of the revenue in question, which is a tax on the national vice of China, must be preceded by the needful remedial processes to recoup the Indian treasury. And this it would be found very difficult to do, inasmuch as we have seen the Government taxing its wisdom to the utmost to raise money from whatever sources possible but hardly able to make both ends of the budget meet. No one would rebuke the Indian Government if, acting on the old saw that everything is just and fair in politics as in love, it may not consider its duty to teach the Chinese lessons in morality. It would certainly be an international scandal if adhering to the terms of the Treaty of Tilen-Toin, the British Government, as it twice did before, go to war with China, in the event of the latter's refusal to receive the Indian drug into its territory as conducing to spoil the morals of its people. But surely those days have gone by. China is now able to hold its own and no repetition of the wars of 1842 and 1800 needs be feared. Then leaving China to deal with its people and their vices, the Indian Government might not abolish the opium duties, but look to a very heavy reduction in the revenue with much apprehension and devise means by which perplexities may be removed. [A few other papers also express satisfaction at the failure of Mr. Smith's motion in connection with the Indian opium revenue. The Kaiser-i-Hind (111), in its issue of the 12th May, adds that it is to be regretted that Mr. Smith, M.P., should have combined his motion for the re-imposition of the Indian import cotton duties with that disapproving of the Indian opium trade, and hopes that Messrs. Smith, Caine, Bradlaugh and other Members of Parliament, who take an interest in Indian affairs, will again bring forward a motion regarding the revival of the import cotton duties.]

Sir Charles Dilke and the Indian defence-works.

3. In noticing the account given by Sir Charles Dilke in the Fortnightly Review of the state of the defences on the Indian frontier, the Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of 13th May, says:—The account is one-sided and must of necessity be full of inaccuracies. Sir Charles Dilke is perfectly satisfied, it appears, with the present condition of the frontier defences and sees no imperfection in the arrangements made by the Government of India to ward off possible dangers from that side. We are of opinion that Sir Charles Dilke has not examined the matter of Indian defences in a thorough manner but has relied on the statements and information placed at his disposal by Sir Frederick Roberts and his officers. Much of Sir C. Dilke's time was taken up by the ordinary conventionalities of Sir F. Robert's hospitality. He had in consequence very little time to examine the other side of the question, viz., the side which Afghanistan presents to a critical observer of frontier questions. The ruler of that country has kept a silence which is very puzzling. There is no doubt tranquillity outside, but what is brewing inside nobody has the least idea of. What Abdul Rahman's real intentions are, there is no means of ascertaining. The practice of appointing an Ambassador at his Court has been discontinued since 1871, and in consequence thereof the Government of India must be finding it very difficult to know the true state of affairs. Sir Charles Dilke's optimistic views in relation to the impregnability of the Indian frontier must not therefore be taken as gospel by the authorities concerned; but the true state of affairs in Afghanistan should be first ascertained, a treaty defining the relations of the two powers be concluded, and the question of defences be settled by the two parties concerned.

Dhulipsing's letter to Her Majesty the Queen demanding the restoration of the Koh-i-noor termed a freak of madness.

4. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 8th May, writes:—Dhulipsing's letter to Her Majesty the Queen-Empress, demanding the restoration of the Koh-i-noor diamond, is mere madness. Dhulipsing hopes to win back his kingdom, but even that would not help him in getting the diamond back, for while to regain the Panjáb he would have to conquer that province only, he could not get the Koh-i-noor without conquering England, and that vision could not have entered his wildest dreams. Dhulipsing is more to be pitied than anything else, because it is quite clear that his mind is unhinged and his pecuniary and other difficulties have made him desperate. Fed with false hopes and vague dreams of ambition he left England and has been a homeless wanderer ever since. The more desperate and reckless he grows the less dangerous he will become, and from his latest freak it is evident that he never fully realised the magnitude of the enterprise that he undertook when he went over to Russia and declared himself an open enemy of England.

Dhulipsing's letter to Her Majesty the Queen demanding the restoration of the Koh-i-noor, and his alleged ill-treatment by the Salisbury Ministry.

5. The Gujaráti (77), in its issue of the 12th May, gives a translation in full of Dhulipsing's letter to Her Majesty the Queen demanding the restoration to him of the diamond Koh-i-noor, as it thinks it worth reading, and prefaces it as follows:—The condition to which Dhulipsing, the unfortunate son of the renowned Sikh Mahárája Ranjitsing of the Panjáb, has been reduced is certainly very distressing. Forsaking the friendship of the British Government, Dhulipsing has taken refuge under the Russians. It is true that he has not done very well in so doing, but it must be borne in mind that he has done so merely out of wrath at the rudeness and low conduct displayed by the Government of Lord Salisbury towards this unfortunate prince. Hence very great blame attaches to the Government of Lord Salisbury for bringing him to his present condition of taking offence at the British Government. Mahárája Dhulipsing was, without any fault of his, deprived of his kingdom of the Panjáb in his infancy along with all his treasure by the Government. The world-renowned diamond Koh-i-noor of Mahárája Ranjitsing, which now adorns the diadem of the Empress Victoria, formed a part of the treasure. Mahárája Dhulipsing now naturally feels much for the loss of this diamond which belonged to him, and hence he has sent the following letter to Her Majesty to regain it from her.

The Wheat Conference held by the Secretary of State for India.

6. The Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 14th May, says:—It is very gratifying that the Wheat Conference held by the Secretary of State for India has come to no definite conclusion. If any law were passed in regard to wheat it would be as disappointing as was the late Cotton Frauds Act. The law would fix the limit up to which the mixture of rubbish would be permissible in a quantity of wheat, but it would be almost impossible for the farmer and the trader to ascertain that the limit was not exceeded, and the law would be an instrument of oppression with Government officials. It would be discreet therefore to give up all idea of passing a law about the mixture of rubbish with wheat.

Revival of the Famine Insurance Fund disapproved.

7. Referring to a telegram received from England to the effect that the Famine Insurance Fund should be re-established, the Shubh Suchak (61), in its issue of the 10th May, writes:—The Government of India's erroneous policy has swallowed up the enormous sum of rupees one kror and a half set apart as a Famine Insurance Fund. What better evidence of the utterly rotten state of the Indian Exchequer can be found than this utilisation of a fund set apart for a different purpose? Nothing can be more mean than to break promises solemnly given or to misappropriate money for purposes for which it was not only not intended to be applied, but solemnly enjoined not to be used. If Government wish to improve the financial condition of the Indian Empire there is one remedy, and that is that the budget should be submitted to the scrutiny of the representatives of the people of this country. The instructions of the Secretary of State for India as given in the telegram appear to us to have no meaning, as there is no possibility of the Famine Insurance Fund being re-established, the means for the same being wanting.

The Indian National Congress and the Pársis.

8. The Rást Goftár (82), in its issue of the 12th May, writes:—We do not think we are wrong in saying that, as a community, the Pársis have never joined the Indian National Congress. A few of their prominent members have attended the annual political festival, but they did not go there as the representatives of their race. The general attitude of the Pársis towards the Congress is that of watchfulness, sympathetic watchfulness, it may be, and now that the next meeting is to be held in a city where Zoroastrians do congregate most, the question is debated among them as to whether, as a body, they should cast in their lot definitely with the Hindus and those of the Mahomedans who have joined the movement. The feeling on the subject which is gaining ground in the community is expressed with tolerable accuracy by Dr. Kaikhoshru R. Vicajee in a letter addressed by him to the Congress Reception Committee. He does not follow Sir Syed Ahmed and his class in offering an irrational opposition to the Congress. The Congress is not an evil thing in itself, and its principle cannot be objected to. But he advises his co-religionists to abstain from taking an active part in the political propaganda, because the Pársis are by race, religion, habits, manners and feelings so far removed from the millions of India that were they, as a body, to ally themselves politically with Hindus and Musalmáns they would be courting a risk in the near future the consequences of which it is not difficult to foresee. What those consequences would be, Dr. Vicajee has omitted to mention. But even without apprehending any serious disaster the question requires to be very earnestly and carefully considered, as to whether the Pársis should give their active support to the movement. It cannot be denied that the Congress has not yet passed beyond an experimental stage. It cannot be foreseen whether the movement will always continue to be directed towards the ventilation of just grievances and the expression of reasonable aspirations. It is also a question of the utmost importance how far the Pársis can coalesce with the other nationalities on the ground of identity of interests, circumstances and feelings.

9. The Gujarát Darpan (75), in its issue of the 16th May, writes:—The wonderful discovery of a Bombay contemporary that as a community the Pársis have never joined the Indian National Congress must have come as a shock to its readers. Its contention that though a few of their prominent men have joined the Congress they did not go there as the representatives of their race presupposes representation as understood in England and other countries, which the Congress does not at all pretend to lay a claim to. The representation on the Congress of various nationalities and races is a crude one such as in the present stage of Indian progress is possible. Looking to this stage of imperfect development of the principle of representation, the members of the Congress have not the unwisdom of calling themselves the representatives of the people, but they call themselves merely delegates sent by different public bodies and chosen in public meetings held at different places. They generally being leading men in the communities to which they belong, their views might be taken to be the views of the bulk of their co-religionists. Keeping this fact in mind one could at a glance know, if he take the trouble to refer to the Congress reports and find out the names of the Pársi delegates, that the contention of our contemporary is simply absurd. Again, the general attitude of the Pársis towards the Congress is not of watchfulness as he says, but, we contend, is of active co-operation. If our contemporary reconsiders the matter, setting aside his prejudice and race-interest, he will find that the standing aloof and the attitude of watchfulness adopted by his community are expressions having no real meaning. To say that the Pársis do not take any part in the general progress of the country is a libel against the whole race and would stamp it as unworthy of the general civilization adopted of the Europeans. Yet Dr. Vicajee, whose letter to the Bombay Reception Committee was the occasion of our contemporary's remarks, advises his co-religionists to abstain from taking an active part in the Congress movement because they are by race, religion, habits, manners and feelings so far removed from the millions of India that were they as a body to ally themselves with Hindus and Musalmáns they would be courting a risk in the near future, the consequences of which it is not difficult to foresee, though he confesses that the Congress is not an evil thing in itself nor can its principle be objected to. The gist of Dr. Vicajee's letter is that the Pársis should remain aloof, for it is their interest to do so. Our contemporary seems to be at one with Dr. Vicajee on this point. If to join the Congress at its experimental stage requires from the Pársi community a great deal of circumspection and foresight, as the Rást Goftár says, we conceive it would tax its pride and self-respect much more when it would join it after the practical stage has been reached and the day is won. It is a very dangerous practice once to advise the Pársis to claim to be natives of India and at another time to forego any title to it, as it suits their convenience. The policy of the bat in the fable, if adopted by the Pársis, is sure to bring them to grief. They would neither be loved of the ruled and favoured of the rulers. Mr. Murzban, who appeared ambitious of being a Pársi Sir Ahmed, has learnt that lesson to his cost. Supposing for a moment this dangerous advice adopted and acted upon the secession of the Pársis from the Congress would not appreciably affect its councils. Though the race is a very influential and energetic one it would suffer on account of its paucity of numbers. It cannot maintain its separate political entity unless it merge into the general population and be led or take the lead as the case may be. If the duration of one thousand years that has elapsed between the landing of the Pársis at Sanján and the present day has not made their interests identical with those of others and, strange to say, not made them natives of the land, to their minds at least, we do not see when their interests will be identical and they become natives of India. Racial antipathies may exist, which put themselves in evidence on occasions. But in which country do we not find the same state of things? Such antipathies do exist in Austria-Hungary, in Canada, and even in England, where the English, the Scots, the Irish and the Welsh congregate, yet the people there work in harmony. So then racial antipathies cannot stand as a plea for a separation of the Pársis from the general movement. On the whole, we see, and the good sense of all wavering Pársi minds will make it visible, that the advice tendered to them of standing aloof from the Congress is a very dangerous one to their self-interest and to their racial pride.

Mr. A. Baumann, M.P. for Peckham, and the Crawford case.

10. The Sudhárak (17), in its issue of the 13th May, writes:—Possibly we shall soon hear the last of the Crawford case. Mr. A. Baumann, Member for Peckham, has given notice of a motion that the conduct of the Bombay Government in respect to the trial of Mr. Crawford has been unfair and vindictive and calls for the censure of the House of Commons. We know there is not the faintest possibility of such a motion being carried. What interest this Honourable Member for Peckham has in this affair cannot be conjectured. It may be that this gentleman is only, as the Bombay Gazette suggests, another Sáthe, a disinterested 'friend of equity and even-handed justice,' put forward by designing persons working from behind. Lord Cross has already expressed his appreciation of the conduct of the Bombay Government in this inquiry. The Ministry is thus bound to support His Excellency Lord Reay, and that means also the support of almost the whole rank and file of the Unionist party. And, as for the Gladstonians and the Parnellites, we need have no fears on their score. Their hostility to official malpractices is too thorough to let them play into the hands of those whose interest it is to cover such practices. We thus think that the motion will either be withdrawn or if pressed to a division be ignominiously rejected. The highest authority in the Empire will then have pronounced its verdict on the conduct of the Bombay Government and a melancholy chapter in the history of our Presidency will thus come to a close. [The Gujaráti (77) of the 12th May feels confident that Mr. Baumann's motion will be rejected by the House of Commons, advises the leading citizens to speedily hold large public meetings in different towns to show their affection towards their popular Governor at a time when an attempt at such a disgraceful uproar against him is being made, and adds that if Bombay wishes to preserve her honour and does not desire to be termed ungrateful, she should immediately hold a large public meeting and pass therein a vote of confidence in His Excellency Lord Reay. The Gujarát Gazette (76) of the 16th May also says that Mr. Baumann's motion will be rejected by the House of Commons and advises the people to memorialize the Home Government to extend His Excellency Lord Reay's term of office and to thereby show how popular he is. The Deshi Mitră (98), in its issue of the 16th May, publishes a dialogue between Mr. Baumann, M.P., and the people of India regarding his motion for a vote of censure against the Bombay Government, in which the latter take him to task for his action and term it unjust and disgraceful, while Mr. Baumann maintains that he has acted rightly in the matter.]

11. The Subodh Patrika (16), in its issue of the 12th May, writes:—The Government of His Excellency Lord Reay is to be charged with being unfair and vindictive in its treatment of the Crawford case and the House of Commons is to be asked to censure it. Then no doubt His Lordship's place would be untenable as has been threatened in some Anglo-Indian quarters. It will not do, however, to condemn the present Governor of Bombay and his Council alone for that offence; the Secretary of State for India and his Council, who have upheld their action, also must go the same way, and still more the rules and regulations which put restraints on the conduct of the services and tend to the purity of the administration. The cry against the Native sub-magistrates too must be swallowed. But if all this is not to be done, then the Conservative member who is to move the censure ought first to call upon his friends Sir J. Fergusson and Sir R. Temple, Lord Reay's immediate predecessors in office, to state why they sanctioned or condoned a violation of the said rules and regulations and thus contributed to the growth of the evil till it became an unbearable scandal.

Mr. Baumann's motion in the House of Commons about the Crawford case disapproved, and His Excellency Lord Reay termed the prime favourite of Madam Justitia.

12. The Pársi Punch (122), in its issue of the 12th May, contains a cartoon in which His Excellency Lord Reay, who holds the minute in the Crawford case in his hands, is represented as standing by the side and under the protection of Madam Justitia, who holds a sword termed Decision in one hand, its point touching the ground, and looks frowningly upon a diminutive person who is trying to terrify His Excellency with a paper mask having the words Vote of Censure written on its top. The letter-press is as follows:—The Scarecrow and Justitia with her prime favourite. ["Mr. A. Baumann, Member for Peckham, has given notice of a motion that the conduct of the Bombay Government in respect to the trial of Mr. Arthur Crawford has been unfair and vindictive and calls for the censure of the House of Commons."—Telegram.] In verses explanatory of the cartoon Madam Justitia contemptuously asks the evil person to go away, saying that she will have the motion thrown off in no time, that there are few sons of hers who serve her so unflinchingly, and that nobody dare take vengeance upon her servant who is under her protection.

Proposed grant of pension to Mr. A. T. Crawford approved.

13. The Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 16th May, says:—If the report that the Bombay Government intend to accord Mr. Crawford a pension of the usual amount for his subsistence be true, then due mercy will be shown to him, showing at the same time due deference to public opinion on the subject. Though this unfortunate officer has on account of his dismissal from the service lost all claim to a pension, yet a recommendation to allow him the usual pension has been made from many quarters, particularly on account of the certain ruin he has encountered. Mr. Crawford has been guilty of grave faults, but what he has already suffered is sufficient punishment to a person of his position. If Mr. Wilson of Cambay notoriety has been allowed a pension, there is no reason why Mr. Crawford should be refused a similar favour.

Alleged recommendation of the Bombay Government for a pension of £400 to Mr. Crawford disapproved.

14. The Gujarát Darpan (75), in its issue of the 16th May, expresses surprise at the Bombay Government having recommended the Secretary of State for India to grant a pension of £400 per annum to Mr. Arthur Crawford owing to his bad pecuniary condition, as alleged, and remarks that if this statement be true it is a matter for regret. It adds that the Bombay Government have made this recommendation, which cannot be accepted, in order to show that they are not hard upon Mr. Crawford, who has now no claims whatever upon his pension, as they know full well that their recommendation will not be adopted. [The Deshi Mitră (98) of the 16th May also disapproves of the recommendation alleged to have been made by the Bombay Government for the grant of an annual pension of £400 to Mr. Crawford, and remarks that it knew long ago that Government would favour their countryman.]

Mr. Crawford's application for a reimbursement of the costs incurred by him in his defence disapproved.

15. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 12th May, writes:—Mr. Crawford's claim to reimbursement of his expenses in connection with the trial seems to be in keeping with his procedure throughout, beginning with his flight in disguise from Poona, leaving inquirers on a false scent on suspicion of his having been drowned, and ending in tactics of reckless and unscrupulous retaliation. The claim comes with peculiar ill-grace from one who has been the cause of one of the greatest scandals to the administration of India, who has cost the local Government a large sum of money on his trial, which money will have to be made good by the tax-payers, who have further been taxed with conspiracy against the virtuous Divisional Commissioner, with the connivance, so his friends have insinuated, of some of his own colleagues. The whole attitude has been discreditable, to say the least of it, and we are not at all surprised at a sober and impartial Judge like Sir R. West having been constrained to characterise it as 'audacious and shameless.' It is a consolation to know, after all this bitter experience, that the Civil Service, as a body, is taking the right view of the case, and that it disowns the offender even though he has managed to escape through the skin of his teeth. For the Native public, all that we can say is that they are unwilling to re-open the sore, and although they can draw their own conclusions from the report of the Commissioners they are content with its practical result. But they will resent every attempt to be fleeced any more for Mr. Crawford's benefit. Some compassionate allowance to Mr. Crawford is a different thing. We suggested it three weeks ago, for the first time; and we believe the suggestion has been acquiesced in for reasons which natives of India are never slow to appreciate. [The Satyavakta (129), in its issue of the 17th May, remarks that if the Secretary of State for India were to allow Mr. Crawford his costs in the case, it would be an unjust burden on the Indian treasury, and hopes that he will not comply with Mr. Crawford's application in the matter. The Yajdán Parast (141), in its issue of the 12th May, refers to the refusal of the Bombay Government to grant Mr. Crawford his costs in the case, does not object to mercy being shown to Mr. Crawford, and remarks that nobody would be grieved if Mrs. Crawford were given the allowance which she would have drawn in case her husband had died before the case cropped up.]

The Times and other English newspapers on the Crawford case.

16. The Rást Goftár (82), in its issue of the 12th May, writes:—It is very instructive to see the English newspapers veer round in their opinion on the Crawford case. They all, with surprising unanimity, approve of the Commissioners' decision. His Excellency Lord Reay is still abused, no doubt; but the condemnation is uttered with "bated breath." The Times still harps, with a perverse ignorance of the powers and limitations of the Governor in Council, upon "his failure to act promptly and vigorously on the finding of the Commission" which, sagely observes the great journal, "seems to us to constitute a serious lapse of judgment." The faith of the Times in its "trustworthy correspondent at Calcutta" is still as blind as its faith was, up till very lately, in the forged letters in the Parnell inquiry. But with all its desire to observe a perverse consistency its change of tone is significant. It no longer speaks of Mr. Crawford as if he were the victim of a base conspiracy and an equally base persecution. It admits that it was of the utmost importance that conduct such as Mr. Crawford's, with all its baneful and wide-spreading consequences, should be censured and repudiated at once by his official superiors. But the Times cannot do without having a fling at His Excellency Lord Reay. It consoles itself with the reflection that the Governor has suffered the humiliation of his decision being over-ruled by the Secretary of State for India. As we observed at the time, and we see the Bombay Gazette, in an article this week, coincides with our view, Lord Cross appears, from the wording of his decision, to have been almost convinced of Mr. Crawford's corruption, but he did not evidently wish to come down very hard upon a fallen man. No one can help being moved by Mr. Crawford's disgrace, and the wish is, we believe, universal that some compassionate allowance should be granted to him, or, at least, to his poor wife, who ought not to be made to suffer for the fault of her husband.

The good effect of the Crawford case.

17. The Gujaráti (77), in its issue of the 12th May, writes:—We have it on Sir R. West's authority that evidence regarding Mr. Crawford's irregular life and official malpractices has been on Government records for a long time past. The circumstances connected with Mr. Crawford's career in Bombay as Municipal Commissioner, his indebtedness from the consequences of which some officials are believed to have shielded him at a critical juncture, and the social scandal which convulsed Native and European society at the time were in themselves more than sufficient reasons for any truly Christian Government to dispense with the services of a man whose moral weaknesses were unquestionably too serious to be overlooked. As a matter of fact, however, not only did the Government not dispense with his services, but it also actually connived at and even encouraged his malpractices by placing him in very responsible positions where he could use his power regardless of the interests of Government and of every other interest concerned. The Mámlatdárs are undoubtedly to blame, Mr. Crawford is still more to blame, and the Government which kept him so long in service with its eyes open is the most to blame. We are sincerely glad, however, that His Excellency Lord Reay has vindicated the honour and reputation of a Christian Government despite the unchristian obloquy heaped upon him, by the adoption of a manly and honest course, and although the interests of strict justice have not been satisfied owing to the intervention of racial sympathies and a too anxious regard for the honour of a privileged class, the recent exposures will doubtless exercise a purifying influence over the whole administration not only in the Bombay Presidency but throughout India.

The bad impression left upon the public mind by the Crawford case.

18. In reviewing the Crawford case, the Subodh Patrika (16), in its issue of the 12th May, writes:—The impressions left upon the public mind by the Crawford case are very unfavourable and prejudicial to the British rule in India. In the first place, it has come to be seriously thought by the public that there are two scales of justice in India, one exclusively for the Civilians and the other for the Native officers; secondly, Commissions of Inquiry are useless and expensive modes of dispensing justice; thirdly, the notion of prestige and authority is so paramount in the English mind that a Civilian, however bad his conduct may be and however loose his morals, is always considered as an officer of spotless character and is supported in all his doings, while a Native officer, however good he may be, has no weight and is looked down upon as an inferior being; fourthly, in this enquiry there was observable throughout a feeling of injured innocence and extreme partiality. We do not know why European Civilians who dined with Mr. Crawford and enjoyed at his expense, and who knew intimately that gentleman, should not have been called to give evidence in the case, while the Chief of Bhor and the Mámlatdárs have been forced to give evidence. On the whole we think the Crawford case has been a source of great humiliation and misery to us. It has emptied the public treasury to a great extent. It has stigmatised the Native subordinate service and seriously jeopardised the interests of Native officers.

The minute of Sir Raymond West in the Crawford case.

19. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 8th May, writes :—Sir Raymond West's minute on the report of the Commissioners has given very great offence in some quarters, and for the present, at least, attention has been diverted from His Excellency the Governor to this Member of his Council. Sir Raymond West had no right, his critics say, to make lengthy comments upon the finding of the Commissioners. A few of the merits of the minute are unwillingly admitted. But the general public will acknowledge the great value of this remarkable minute, whether the opinion therein expressed may commend itself to Mr. Crawford's friends or not. The combined report of the Commissioners is unquestionably inferior to Sir Raymond's minute in almost every respect. The closeness of the reasoning and the force and clearness of the logic displayed in the minute make it without question a more valuable judicial document than the Commissioners' report. As to the main point at issue we have already expressed our opinion on the subject. Sir Raymond West contends that the Commission not being an ordinary court of justice the Commissioners should have approached their subject in another manner and should have considered the charges cumulatively as well as severally. If the Commissioners laid down the law as in an ordinary court of justice we cannot blame them. At the same time it would be absurd to find fault with Sir Raymond West's minute, because as a Judge he is superior to any of the three judges of the Commission, and has shown that he can hold his own against the united logic of the Commissioners.

The Mámlatdárs concerned in the Crawford case.

20. The Sind Times (5), in its issue of the 11th May, writes :—There is one very important point—at least to us it is — which we do not see discussed and given prominence to elsewhere, in connection with the protests of the High Court of Bombay against the retention in Government service of the Mámlatdár witnesses who confessed to having bought their offices. The point we refer to is this : No doubt the Mámlatdárs did confess, in their evidence before the Crawford Commission, that they did bribe Mr. Crawford. Now, the Secretary of State's decision has completely exonerated Mr. Crawford from the charge of bribery. So that it comes to this, that no bribe could have been given, as none is proved to have been accepted. So that the witnesses (the Mámlatdárs) must have either perjured themselves under pressure from the police and made false statements, or that they did actually bribe Mr. Crawford. The latter is not now tenable as the Secretary of State for India has in a manner honourably acquitted Mr. Crawford from the charge of bribery. So that there was in reality no corruption on the part of the Mámlatdárs, and hence the protest, premature and though not inconsiderate, cannot stand. We put forward this view of the protest as one of the many brought out, but we give special preference to it as it sounds a more reasonable argument to get His Excellency Lord Reay out of his present difficult position.

21. The Bakul (22), in its issue of the 12th May, says :—The self-incriminated Mámlatdárs in the Crawford case are not deserving of compassion either from Government or from the people. Their actions are as black and they are as guilty as Hanmantrão. We expected from them better morals and a higher sense of duty. We considered them as the pillars of our social fabric and as men whose minds have been purified by the education they have received. Their repentance afterwards and their readiness to tell the truth do not amend their previous conduct. If they had at the very outset, when they were threatened by Mr. Crawford with dismissal, boldly come forward and exposed the injustice of which they were victims, we should have been the first to pat them on their backs and say "Well done, Gentlemen." But they had their own ends in view and their intense selfishness got the better of their prudence. In our opinion they are cowards and no reliance can be placed on their statements.

22. The Gujaráti (77), in its issue of the 12th May, writes:—His Excellency Lord Reay's address to the Bombay Chamber of Commerce has been favourably noticed everywhere. We have already noticed some of the principal points in it; but there are certain circumstances connected with the novel departure, which deserve some consideration. The very fact that Lord Reay was compelled to deliver an address out of his Council on important financial questions shows, as we have already pointed out, that the existing Provincial Councils are inadequate for the functions of an enlightened government. Again, the influence of political and social institutions is so powerful, though the people are not always conscious of it, that even when a liberal-minded ruler like Lord Reay resolved to strike out a novel path for himself, he unconsciously yielded to that exclusive spirit which characterises the whole administration. Even when he was prepared to cast off the fetters of exclusiveness in one direction, he was so bound down by the prevailing spirit of political institutions in India that he was unconsciously, but irresistibly, led to take the Chamber of Commerce alone into his confidence in preference to any other influential body of Natives in Bombay. We do not at all mean to insinuate that Lord Reay wished to cast any unmerited slur upon the Bombay Presidency Association. But the fact remains that the surrounding moral atmosphere was too strong even for the lighter influences controlling a large-hearted soul. Visit a court of justice or a public play-ground, compare Native with European organization, and examine the relative position of Natives and Englishmen of equal position and abilities in a public office, it will be found that a priori presumptions of intrinsic superiority and merit occupy a very prominent and important place in fixing the relative position of Natives and Europeans. For example, there was surely no reason why the members of the Presidency Association should not have been taken into confidence by Lord Reay. But the explanation of the course actually adopted is perfectly obvious. An independent and liberal statesman will always find it too irksome and even provoking to be fettered by illiberal administrative methods; but then he too cannot violently shake off the narrow influences and traditions of the past. In the midst of bracing freedom and high-souled liberalism there is an unconscious slavery, and the solitary promptings of the former, however praiseworthy in other respects, may become the source of just indignation and dissatisfaction owing to the absence of even and consistent adjustment and balance of relations between the rulers and the ruled.

A request to Government to provide for the segregation of lepers in Bombay.

23. The Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 17th May, alludes to the indispensable necessity for segregating lepers in Bombay in order to prevent the spread of this contagious and incurable disease among the people with whom the lepers now come in contact in almost all public places, and requests Government to at once make a due provision for the segregation of the unfortunate beings.

A suggestion for the abolition of the post of Political Agent, Káthiáwár, with a view to effect a saving.

24. The Káthiáwádi (80), in its issue of the 7th May, says:—If Government are really desirous of retrenching expenditure, Káthiáwár affords a good field. The place of Political Agent for Káthiáwár, if abolished, would bring in a large saving which might be utilized in a better way. The President of the Rájasthánik Court or one of the numerous Political Assistants might be appointed to look over the whole province. The army of Assistants and Deputy Assistants might be lessened by making each division of the Káthiáwár Province consist of five Pránts.

Reform in Káthiáwár and suggestions to the Bombay Government and Mr. Lely, Acting Political Agent, in the matter.

25. The Ahmedabad Times (85), in its issue of the 14th May, says:—For the improvement of the ill-used and unhappy province of Káthiáwár we make the following suggestions and invite the attention of Government and of Mr. Lely, Acting Political Agent, Káthiáwár, to carry them into practice:—Firstly, the several Nágar Shirastedárs, Thánádárs and Agency officers, the protegés of Colonel Watson, the patron of the Nágar community, who are dispersed all over the country, much to the disadvantage of the Káthiáwádis, should be transferred. Secondly, all petitions and applications made to the Political Agent with respect to particular cases of oppression or injustice or overlooking of claims should be thoroughly investigated and disposed of. Thirdly, the fund collected for the memorial of the late Colonel Watson from the Chiefs, gentry and the people of the province under pressure and influence should at once be stopped and the money utilized for founding scholarships for poor Káthiáwádi students. Fourthly, a new court called the Tálukdári Adálat should be established in place of the Rájasthánik Court, which is to continue in existence till 1890, its work having been completed. The new court should consist of a Civilian judge, who should be invested with powers to hear appeals in tálukdári cases which under existing circumstances are not allowed to be carried to an appellate tribunal. This court should be independent and the appointments and dismissals of the officers of the court should be in the hands of the Bombay Government. Fifthly, in all courts of justice care should be taken to see that the officers do not belong to one community. Sixthly, in giving places the testimonials and the abilities of the applicants should be looked into; no Nágar should be appointed to a post at once. Seventhly, written complaints against officers should be promptly investigated. The paper then gives instances in order to prove the necessity for carrying out the suggestions made by it.

The Surat fire and the necessity of Government help.

26. The Gujarát Darpan (75), in its issue of the 12th May, writes:—It is interesting to learn at the present time that the Madras Government, acting on the strength of an official report on a recent disastrous fire at Cochin, has sanctioned a sum between Rs. 5,000 and Rs. 10,000 to be advanced to the sufferers for tiling and roofing their houses with such materials as might not easily catch fire. What our local Government has been requested to do by the Praja Hit Vardhak Sabha of Surat is that it should supply timber and other building materials at cost price to the sufferers and help them in other ways it deems fit. The fire at Cochin was nothing compared to the Surat disaster. The Madras Government is in a less flourishing condition as to finances than ours. Surat is a more important and interesting city than Cochin. The number of sufferers here is greater in proportion, the calamity was greater, and the effects far-reaching in the same degree. So then we should not be expecting too much from a richer Government for a greater city, afflicted with a greater calamity, if we ask the Bombay Government to graciously grant at once the request of our local Sabha. If the Government, expecting that the wide-spread sympathy evoked for Surat would do everything that is needful, would remain inactive, we would consider it to have erred in doing its duty by the city and its people. But we need not fear any inactivity and negligence from a Governor of His Excellency Lord Reay's stamp.

Remark made by the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh regarding the inadvisability of sentencing European offenders to rigorous imprisonment in the tropical Indian climate condemned.

27. The Kaiser-i-Hind (111), in its issue of the 12th May, comments on the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh's decision in the case of two European guards of the Oudh and Rohilkhand Railway who assaulted a Native groom, and says:—The ground on which the Judicial Commissioner in Oudh has reduced the sentence of rigorous imprisonment passed by the Faizabad Magistrate on the railway guards is certainly very curious. That a European is not fit to undergo a sentence of rigorous imprisonment in the heat of this country is certainly a new principle which only a Judicial Commissioner in Oudh alone can find out. What has climate to do with the demands of strict and stern justice? That the sentence should have been reduced on this absurd ground seems to us to be a serious miscarriage of justice and likely to lead the people to the inference that there are two scales of justice, one for Europeans culprits and the other for Natives. Silence on the part of the Judicial Commissioner would have been certainly better, but his remarks that European culprits should be treated with some allowance and sentences in their case should be light because of the excessive heat of this country are both unbecoming of a judge and partial in the extreme. [A few other papers take a similar view and draw the attention of Government to the matter.]

The arrest of the Náthdwár Maháráj in Bombay on a warrant before judgment considered as a gross indignity.

28. The Gujaráti (77), in its issue of the 12th May, writes:—Whether one sympathises or not with the high religious claims of the Náthdwár 'Tikaet' Maháráj as an incarnation of the deity, it is quite clear from the circumstances of the case that he should not have been subjected to the gross indignity of sudden arrest. With all due deference to the learned Judge who issued an attachment order before judgment, we feel bound to say in the interests of justice and individual freedom that though Section 478 of the Civil Procedure Code leaves a wide discretion to the Court, it is a rational and judicial discretion to be exercised according to the circumstances of each case. The section distinctly says: "If the Court, after examining the applicant and making such further investigation as it thinks fit, is satisfied that the defendant with the intent of leaving the jurisdiction of the Court is about to leave British India, the Court may issue a warrant to arrest and bring him before the Court to show cause why he should not give security for his appearance." Now in a case of the kind in question, we think further investigation referred to in the Code was quite necessary, and even if the Judge had been satisfied that the Maháráj was leaving British India, there was the very important question of the jurisdiction of the Court to be considered, and it is not a little surprising that the order for an attachment before judgment should have been issued without a discussion of the question which the learned Chief Justice has decided in favour of the defendant to the great satisfaction of the Vaishnava community. There is one aspect of the case which deserves special attention, because in the mofussil plaintiffs frequently resort to the very ingenious method adopted in this instance of causing the greatest inconvenience and inflicting the greatest indignity by serving the warrant of arrest at a late hour on Saturday, so that the defendant is left in the majority of cases without an opportunity for obtaining redress or bail for nearly twenty-four hours. This cruel device ought, however, to be effectively checked by Judges by making fuller preliminary investigations in order to satisfy themselves of the boná fides of the plaintiff. [The Gujarát Mitră (78), in its issue of the 12th May, says that in such cases the question of jurisdiction should be first decided, that it is tyrannical to have a person arrested on warrant before the point has been decided, and that it is shocking that a respectable man should thus be dishonoured in the British territories.]

29. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 12th May, writes:—As an instance of how the Civil Courts are used now and then by designing persons to bring any opponent or enemy of theirs into dishonour and disgrace, we may mention the well-managed arrest of Maháráj Govardhanlálji, the head-priest of the influential Gujaráti sect of Vaishnavas, on a warrant of arrest before judgment obtained at the instance of his father, who sued him for thirty-two lákhs of rupees. This father was the high-priest of the Náthdwára shrine—a fief of Udeypur. He was deposed by the Political Agent of Meywar and His Highness the Maháraja of Udeypur for extortionate demands made upon pilgrims and for not sending the pán supári daily to the palace of the king as he was bound to do by the terms on which he held the fief. The son Govardhanlálji was then placed on the gádi. This gentleman is now on a tour of pilgrimage. His father wanted him not to take the insignia of office on the ground that he (the father) was the high-priest. He further claimed rupees thirty-two lákhs' treasure stored in the temple as his private property. For this sum a suit has been filed in the Court. The warrant of arrest was obtained on a representation that the defendant was about to leave Bombay. The warrant was executed at 5 P.M. on Saturday, in order evidently that there should be no redress for some time at least and the Maháráj should thus be put to the greatest inconvenience and indignity. However, his devotees in Bombay, men of wealth and note, stood bail for him and he was allowed to go to his house by the Sheriff, Mr. Yájnik, after being detained in custody for a few hours. On Monday both the parties appeared before the Chief Justice, when he ordered the Maháráj to be released, observing that he was not a resident of Bombay and the Court had no jurisdiction. Everyone will sympathise with the Maháráj and condemn the action of the unnatural father.

The suggested abolition of the Bench of Magistrates in the Dhárwár District disapproved.

30. The Karnátak Patrá (145), in its issue of the 13th May, says:—We are surprised to hear that Mr. Winter, Collector of Dhárwár, has reported to Government the advisability of abolishing the Bench of Magistrates in the district on the ground that some of them are uneducated, ignorant of law and quite unable to do their duty. We hope that men like Ráo Bahádur Trimalráo and Mr. Krishnaráo Diwán will be appointed on the Bench and that the system will not be discontinued.

31. The Káthiáwár Times (81), in its issue of the 12th May, writes:—Complaints are often made that regimental officers, owing to insufficiently officered regiments and the ever-increasing demands of military education, not to mention their being drawn away on special duty, have not been able to obtain privilege leave. Very few of the hundreds of officers who served in Burmah have been able to avail themselves of the three months' leave promised by Government. It is certainly hard on the officers that many of them should not have been able to get privilege leave for five years or more. It is rightly urged that this difficulty could to a great extent be alleviated by a more even distribution of the probationers for the staff corps instead of attaching them to regiments quartered in large Indian stations on the plea of their learning Hindustáni. "This is no doubt the reason why young gentlemen from all parts of India are allowed to flock to Bombay, there to disport themselves gaily and frivolously, and put more money in the pockets of Mahomed Ali and Co. than the latter ever crammed knowledge into their heads. After six months' frivolity at Bombay the probationer returns to his regiment impoverished, unpassed, having learned no Hindustáni, and for six months been of no use to his regiment." Probationers could be profitably employed in place of the adjutant, quarter-master, &c., to enable the latter to avail themselves of leave. What progress in languages is made by regimental officers will be observed from the following:—"For what purpose on earth does Government pay its officer (or rather the all-absorbing munshi) to learn Hindustáni? Does it suppose that any officer, six months after he has passed his higher standard examination, can read a petition in Hindustáni? Does it suppose that those officers who are so fortunate as to be dubbed interpreters to the several Commanders-in-Chief in India are really passed adepts in oriental languages? Who reads all the Hindustáni and Persian letters and petitions but the writers and munshis, be it in the office of a soldier or a civilian?" We endorse every word of this. What have the Civil and Military Examination Committees to say to this? We have known officers who have passed the higher tests never having a colloquial knowledge of Hindustáni. The examiners should certainly suggest a practical course of instruction in place of the old twaddle Bágho Bhár and the Prem-Ságar.

Death of Ráo Sáheb Vishvanáth Náráyan Mandlik deeply regretted.

32. The Sudhárak (17), in its issue of the 13th May, writes:—The mournful news of the death of this veteran leader of the Native community will be received with universal and profound grief throughout the length and breadth of the country. Mr. Mandlik's eminent and distinguished career, the devotion with which he watched public interests, and above all the sturdy independence of his character made him a most unique figure in public life; and in the estimation of all communities he occupied a position so high that it is the lot of very few indeed to attain to that height. In him we lose one to whom it was given to long serve his country in varied capacities with remarkable ability. He was a man of high integrity and an austere and fearless champion of whatever he considered to be right. The loss which his death causes will remain unrepaired for a long time, for vainly may we look, at least in the community to which he belonged—the Marátha community,—for one who will immediately take his place. Mr. Telang is a rising luminary, but it will be yet time before he attains the position of the Ráo Sáheb; and amongst those who are free from the trammels of Government service and are thus in a position to fight for the interests of the Natives in an open and fearless manner, Mr. Telang is now the only person that we can turn our eyes to.

33. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 12th May, writes:—Ráo Sáheb V. N. Mandlik was a leader in the true sense of the word, a leader with unlimited influence and resources, who always kept touch with his followers. The strength of a nation is the strength of its leaders; and Mr. Mandlik's was a vivid example of how such strength secures respect and recognition for the customs and institutions of a community, which a weak and compromising leader will only bring into ridicule. No nation is free from defects and no leader can afford to connive at them. But that does not mean that we should give up our self-respect and individuality, and this is what we have to learn from Mr. Mandlik's career. He possessed in an eminent degree what we so sadly want in these days, and if we do not wish to be vanquished in the race for existence that is getting harder and harder every year, we must study and follow the Ráo Sáheb's career and example. The cruel hand of death has snatched from amongst us rather prematurely a noble personality; but he lives and will long continue to live in our memory. May this memory help us to follow his example, and may his mantle fall upon some one in the younger generation!

34. The Gujarát Darpan (75), in its issue of the 12th May, writes:—The loss occasioned by the untimely death of Ráo Sáheb V. N. Mandlik, C. S. I., will long continue to be felt among the popular leaders and all India will have to wait for some time to see his like. Descended of a high and wealthy family, the Ráo Sáheb showed all the qualities of a high-caste orthodox Bráhman. The rare qualities of independence of character, combined with iron will, sound judgment and close application, aided him throughout his brilliant and varied life. Called to various vocations in his chequered life, he acted with a sense of justice, impartiality and earnestness which loudly call for approbation. All India will continue to be proud of him, who, at a time when political activity in India was at a very low ebb, kept up that spirit in a growing state and showed to the world at large how fully, how soundly and in what masterly a manner he could deal with political subjects. The several speeches that he made, both in the Bombay and the Viceregal Legislative Councils, are standing monuments of his high intellectual powers. He was no mean literary writer and his legal knowledge was immense. But he was no exception to the trite but all true maxim "man is liable to err," and his failing was but too plainly seen in his dealing with social questions. To spare much criticism on this point we would simply allude to the now historic Mádhav Bág meeting. [The death of the Honourable Ráo Sáheb Vishvanáth Náráyan Mandlik is deeply regretted by the papers of this week.]

Alleged breach of etiquette on the part of Mr. Pritchard, Commissioner in Sind.

35. The Káthiáwár Times (81), in its issue of the 12th May, writes:—A correspondent in a Karáchi newspaper rightly takes to task the Commissioner in Sind for having addressed a meeting convened at the Denso Hall on Good Friday in an informal manner without rising from his chair. The conduct of the Commissioner is defended on the ground that as the attendance was sparse it was not deemed necessary to address the meeting in the usual othodox manner. It is urged in extenuation of his conduct that Mr. Erskine, the late Commissioner, had also addressed those present sitting in the chair at a meeting held in Frere Hall in connection with the erection of a memorial tower to the late Sir William Merewether. We consider that both Mr. Erskine and Mr. Pritchard were decidedly in the wrong. At a public meeting speakers are bound to rise whether they address one man or a thousand men, and the public or any and every citizen has every right to denounce the conduct of those who deviate from the usual rules of decorum. By speaking without standing, Mr. Pritchard could hardly have exalted himself in anybody's estimation but his own. It was a distinct breach of etiquette. At informal meetings His Excellency the Governor and many other noblemen and gentlemen are known to speak, as a rule, standing. Lord Reay and others do not act thus simply out of a too sensitive regard for the "squeamishness" of their Native friends, but because they know that gentlemanly behaviour is expected from them. The question is not whether the hearers are gentlemen, but whether the speakers are, and no true gentleman will be less polite to men because they wear shabby coats or hawk vegetables through the streets.

Complaint against Captain Kennedy, Acting Third Assistant to the Political Agent, Káthiáwár, and Mr. Keshavlál Pránjivan, Judge of Vasávad.

36. The Rájyabhakt (126), in its issue of the 14th May, once more reverts to the necessity for removing Mr. Keshavlál Pránjivan, Judge of Vasávad, from his post (vide paragraph 27 of the Report on Native Papers, No. 19 of 1889), quotes the opinion of Captain Kennedy himself against the Judge expressed in the Captain's decision in a certain case and dated the 18th October 1888, asks why Captain Kennedy hesitates to remove him, and requests Government to enquire into the matter.

Praise of Ráo Sáheb K. P. Joshi, Mámlatdár of Gadag in the Dhárwár District.

37. Referring to the transfer of Ráo Sáheb Krishnáji Pándurang Joshi, Mámlatdár of Gadag, to the Kolába District, the Rasik Ranjini (146), in its issue of the 9th May, says that he was an impartial, just and kind officer, and that people in Gadag are very sorry to part with him.

Sale of Government land for building purposes at Bándra since 1878-79.

38. One Limji Jamsetji Nádodvála writes as follows in the Jáme Jamshed (108) of the 16th May:—In 1860 it was the rule in the Thána District as well as the rest of the Bombay Presidency that if a person opened a quarry in a cultivable plot of ground he should be made to pay Government thirty times the annual assessment of the land. Afterwards permission was granted to persons to build houses on cultivable lands on the same terms. Subsequently the price of land rose and permission was granted to build houses or open quarries at the rate of Rs. 500 per acre. In 1879-80 the charge was raised still more, namely, Rs. 1,000 were exacted per acre for so much land as was actually occupied by a building, the land included in the compound of the building paying annual assessment, and since then numerous houses have been built at Bándra under this rule, the householders possessing receipts for the money paid by them. Since the last fortnight the Taláti of Bándra has been going round informing the householders who have built their houses since 1879 that they should pay the sum that would be chargeable to them for the land included in their compounds, at the rate of Rs. 1,000 per acre, as the payment made by them before was for the land actually occupied by a building. This demand is evidently unjust as the land included in a compound is not used for any other purpose than cultivation. In Bándra land can be purchased for two annas per square yard, while Government wants to charge a rupee and a quarter per square yard as a fine. If no such fine is imposed in the town of Bombay, Poona or Surat, there seems to be no good reason why the district of Thána alone should be subjected to it.

Alleged hardship upon the labourers in Katárgám, Surat District, and a request to the Mámlatdár of Chorási in the matter.

39. The Suryă Prakásh (84) of the 11th May disapproves of the Patel at Katárgám having, with the sanction of the Mámlatdár of Chorási, stopped the labouring class in that place from removing earth from the tank there, and says that when the labourers do not get work they sell the earth removed from the tank in question for a paltry sum, that they have been enjoying this privilege for a very long time past, that the removal of earth from the tank is beneficial to the public, and that the order should be cancelled by the Mámlatdár as the labourers do not get work and as the prices of articles of food have risen very high owing to the scanty rainfall last year. It adds that the local potters pay a fee for the removal of the earth because they make a large profit out of it.

Licenses for keeping boarding-houses in Bombay disapproved.

40. With reference to the instructions issued by Government, after obtaining the opinion of the Advocate General, to the police of Bombay to take before a Police Magistrate a new case of a boarding-house failing to obtain a license from the police, in order that the question of a license may be finally settled by the High Court if the Magistrate refuses to convict the boarding-house proprietor, the Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 13th May, says:—The decision given by Mr. Hamilton on a former occasion, refusing to convict the proprietor of a boarding-house for not taking out a license, appears just, and Government ought not to insist upon the license being taken. Numerous poor people who cannot afford to keep a household of their own take their meals at a boarding-house and either sleep in a small room rented for the purpose or in the verandahs of other people's houses. If a boarding-house is compelled to take a license it will amount to so much tax on the meals of these poor persons, without bringing in any appreciable sum of money to Government. While strenuous efforts are being made in England to exempt tea, sugar, bread and butter from even a small tax in the public interests, it is not right to impose a special tax on the food of the poor people in Bombay whose meals are very poor. [The Pársi Tikákár (123) of the 15th May also disapproves of the owners of boarding-houses in Bombay being compelled to take out licenses.]

The prostitutes' quarters in Karáchi and the necessity of removing them from their present site.

41. The Sind Sudhár (165), in its issue of the 11th May, writes:—About two or three years ago it was said that Government was thinking of removing the prostitutes' lines from the present site in the heart of the town of Karáchi to a large unoccupied piece of land near the Barracks. All people, and more especially those at present living near the prostitutes' quarter, were very glad to see that steps were being taken to remove the nuisance they long complained of; but it seems that the rumour has turned out to be false and the people have consequently been sorely disappointed. The Beluch sepoys now live near the Camp, and although they can get all their supplies in the Camp, still they visit the town more frequently than is necessary for them to do. The chief cause is the location of prostitutes in the town, and that has resulted in bloodshed and tumults on several occasions. By the removal of prostitutes' quarters to the Barracks it is certain that the Beluch sepoys will not have so much to do with the town, and consequently all the disturbances that now take place in the town will cease. Besides this advantage, the houses at present occupied by the prostitutes in the heart of the town, which is overcrowded, will be available for the townspeople, who are unwilling to shift to the Barracks. By this arrangement the land now lying unoccupied near the Barracks will also be utilized and the evils and diseases that frequently take place at present will be lessened. We hope that the proper authorities will see to this and take the necessary steps.

PART II.—Legislation.

Amendment of the Indian Factory Act.

42. With reference to the despatch of the Government of India on the working of the Indian Factory Act presented to the House of Commons, the Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 16th May, says:—Since the Bengal Government says that the factories in Bengal are closed on every Sunday and the Bombay Government has recommended that women and children should not be allowed to work on Sundays and has observed that since the mill-hands work very leisurely there is no need of curtailing their working hours, it would not be improper to require all Indian mills to be closed on Sundays and to insist upon the workmen being employed from 7 in the morning to 6 in the evening, they being allowed one hour for taking their meals and rest. Such an amendment of the Factory Act as here indicated would cause no pecuniary loss either to the mill-owners or the mill-hands, and ought to be adopted.

Dr. Hewlett and the Bombay Village Sanitation Bill.

43. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 12th May, writes:—One cardinal defect seems to us to vitiate almost the whole of Dr. Hewlett's criticism on the Bombay Village Sanitation Bill. He fails to see that the villagers are left to manage their own affairs under instructed guidance, and that it is only in the event of certain groups failing to give heed to the extremely moderate proposals that the Government will step up to them, as schoolmasters step up to incorrigible pupils. If the Bill sets the villagers working, the latter will have no fear of interference. If the Bill does not avail so far, why, then, the villagers deserve some sort of interference in their own best interests? The measure in charge of Sir Raymond West is moderate and tentative, dealing only with the grosser forms of public nuisance and even to that extent feeling its way step by step. So far as practicable every provision of the Bill has been drafted with due regard to the intelligence and precuniary resources of the people whom it intends to benefit. Such official guidance alone has been availed of as is absolutely necessary and easily available. And wherever there is room for improvement, the author of the Bill is sure to welcome it. What more can the critics require? Any radical change in the measure could hardly be dictated, save by the desire of letting things alone. That would really be too bad. For hundreds of years have our villagers neglected the simplest rules of sanitation. Under Native rule, we believe, they managed things a little better, —the punishment for every flagrant neglect came sharp and swift in those days, though we are not so certain if it always overtook the right parties. In our day Government must needs adopt somewhat elaborate and cumbrous methods. To revert to the old pancháyat is out of the question. Let us see what can be done with a new kind of pancháyat.

PART III.—Education.

Alleged unlawful conduct of Mr. Macnaghten, Principal, Rájkumár College, Rájkot, in collecting about Rs. 450 from the students under him in order to present a golden ornament to Miss Hancock on the occasion of her wedding.

44. The Rájyabhakt (126), in its issue of the 14th May, complains once more against Mr. Macnaghten, Principal, Rájkumár College, Rájkot, having some time back illegally collected about Rs. 450 from the princes studying under him and having presented a golden ornament purchased out of that amount to the daughter of Colonel Hancock, then Acting Political Agent, on the occasion of her marriage with Captain Salmon, and says that Mr. Macnaghten's object in presenting the ornament to the daughter of the Political Agent, who is ex-officio president of the Rájkumár College, must, it seems, be to oblige him and to thereby make him defend his unlawful conduct, and that the Bombay Government ought to enquire into the matter. It adds that if Government connive at it, it will have to place the subject into the hands of a well-wisher of India like Mr. Bradlaugh, M.P., and to take steps to stop the high-handed action of Mr. Macnaghten.

PART IV.—Railways.

The Golden Gang on the G. I. P. Railway and the employment of Natives as guards and engine-drivers on that line.

45. The Rást Goftár (82), in its issue of the 12th May, writes:—The Golden Gang on the G. I. P. Railway, let us hope, is broken up. All have escaped save one man, who got his deserts at the last criminal sessions of the Bombay High Court. We think, however, that there was more of the dupe than of the knave in him. There were greater rogues behind the scenes, but the police did not succeed in bringing them to justice. The moral to be drawn from this case may be remembered with advantage by the G. I. P. Railway Company. In many departments where Pársis and other Natives can do the work more cheaply and as efficiently, if not more, Europeans, Eurasians and East Indians are employed by preference. They are generally men of very little learning, and as for the men of mixed parentage they partake to some extent of the defects of both Europeans and Natives without having much of the virtues of either. The recent disclosures have at least proved that Europeans, whether pure or mixed, possess no special qualifications to render them more useful and honest as railway guards and engine-drivers than Natives. Dishonesty is an infirmity peculiar to all races, though we think that if the Golden Gang had consisted of Natives, many Anglo-Indian newspapers would have dilated upon the folly of employing Natives, whose inherent wickedness can be purged by nothing—no, not even by the better example of their very superior neighbours.

A complaint against the Sind-Punjab Railway.

46. The Sind Sudhár (165), in its issue of the 11th May, writes:—It is greatly to be regretted that the railway officers cannot manage their work satisfactorily. The trains from Sukkur now start from the "main station"—an arrangement very inconvenient to the passengers. It is therefore necessary that another local train should run between Sukkur Bandar and Jacobabad. Three local trains at present run from Sukkur Bandar to Sukkur Main. As a few passengers travel by them the cost of running them seems unnecessary. Either the Sukkur Bandar station should be closed or only one assistant station-master at that station should be kept. At the Main Station the services of two booking-clerks appear absolutely necessary. We hope that the railway authorities will see to this.

The Wadhwán Junction Station and a request to the railway authorities.

47. The Káthiáwádi (80), in its issue of the 7th May, complains of the inconvenience and trouble caused to passengers by the want of a roof over the space between the B. B. & C. I. and the Bhávnagar-Gondal Railway Station at Wadhwán and of a good station platform, and requests the authorities of both the railways to speedily remedy the complaint.

PART V.—Municipalities.

The Bombay Municipality and the water-rate on public places of worship.

48. A correspondent of the Din Bandhu (7), in its issue of the 12th May, writes :—The enclosed copy of a letter addressed to the Municipal Commissioner, Bombay, has casually come under my observation, and as it exhibits to my mind a somewhat serio-comic phase of municipal taxation under the new Act, I send it to you for the information of your readers. The man from whom it is proposed to ask the water-rate is a poor labourer. Verily the new Bombay Municipal Act is Kuber's treasure. The letter runs : "Sir, a week ago your ward clerk presented me a bill for water-rate in connection with the place of worship opposite to my house. I would respectfully submit that this place of worship is a mere niche in a corner adjoining two properties of which I am not the owner. A stone representation of the god Hanumán has been in this niche for years past, and has been looked after by no particular individual—in fact, it needs no care and is a sort of shrine seen in so many places in Bombay in the recesses of walls. Beyond occasionally placing a light and sweeping the public road in front of it as a devotional duty, I have no further concern with the said niche. The place is a mere span and there is no water and none is required. I am told that the new Municipal Act requires all public places of worship to be taxed, but I would respectfully submit that such niches in the sides of walls and corners, where the worshippers, an individual here and there, make their salutations while passing by the road, can hardly be intended to be taxed. I am a poor man earning only sufficient for my bread and unable to contribute to the tax, and therefore humbly beg that you will be pleased to reconsider your decision and withdraw the bill against me."

PART VI.—Native States.

Nomination of a Council for the administration of Kashmir disapproved.

49. In alluding to the institution of a Council for the administration of Kashmir, the Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 15th May, says :—The Native public is dissatisfied with this arrangement. The Resident of Kashmir will virtually be the ruler of the State, the Mahárája having little authority to interfere in the administration. It is quite natural that this position of the Mahárája should disquiet the minds of his brother princes. The alleged seditious correspondence exposing what was said to be an attempt to poison Mr. Plowden, the late Resident, does not seem to have been the cause of the new arrangement, which appears to have been resorted to on account of some political reasons having connection with the fact that Kashmir is a border State. English statesmen have accepted the sound rule that it is beneficial that a small State situated between the countries of two powerful rulers should be kept quite independent, but the Indian authorities appear to entertain an opinion contrary to the above. There is no need of showing that the latter view is not sound. The change effected in the administration of Kashmir appears to be one long thought of, and indicates that the Government of India have been compelled to take this course under the pressure of certain cares and anxieties of which the Indian public know nothing.

50. The Gujarát Mitră (78), in its issue of the 12th May, writes:—To the Baroda Prince and to his hard-worked officials a near and agreeable sanitarium is a prime necessity. The Powagad Hill is the only place which will answer all purposes. There is no doubt that even if the proposal is shelved now, it must be attended to in future. The consideration of it, however, need not be delayed. The present geographical distribution of His Highness' territories is worthy of the serious consideration of both the Government and the Baroda State. The remote and isolated parts of His Highness' territories should be given over to the Bombay Government if His Excellency Lord Reay be pleased to propose the transfer of an equally valuable territory on the Powagad side. Undoubtedly there would be some constitutional difficulties in carrying out the territorial transfers, which, however, are not insuperable. No reason would exist for any Gáikwád to travel abroad for a long time and to resort to sanitaria not within his own jurisdiction, if a lovely place were at hand. Progress towards the solution of the question could be made by first adopting measures which would be practical and not require the sanction of the British Parliament. The Baroda State may propose to construct bungalows on some of the more accessible points of the Powagad Hill, for ample tableland is available for the purpose. If Lords Lansdowne and Reay are disposed to facilitate a negotiation of this character, we do not think His Highness Sir Sayáji Ráo would object to such a proposal being made. The carrying out of the project will prove a great boon to the reigning family of the Gáikwád and his numerous subjects and servants. The distance would be traversed by a small railway in an hour, tapping important villages on the way. The British Government are as much interested in the improvement of the Baroda State as its own ruler is. Some attention has latterly been paid to the establishment of a sanatarium at Umreth; but it apparently will not meet all the wants which the Powagad project is likely to supply. The sea resort will always be useful, but will not supply all the excellences of a near and very rich, luxuriant and salubrious hill resort for the hot weather.

His Highness the Gáikwád and a sanitarium for him and his hard-worked officials.

51. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 8th May, writes:—The State of Khairpur has been going steadily from bad to worse. The Government have placidly looked on and have not raised a finger to warn or save the drifting vessel of the administration. In the annual administration reports of the Bombay Presidency the Khairpur State is referred to briefly with dry humour as being in the same 'patriarchal' state as before. Beyond that the report is discreetly silent. There is no Political Agent at Khairpur, although His Highness the Mir is entitled to a salute of seventeen guns and consequently takes rank as a second class prince. The annual revenue compared with the extent of the territory is ridiculously small, and the treasury is always empty. In fact, the State is heavily in debt. The ostensible reason for this prolonged non-interference is that His Highness Mir Ali Murad is a very old man, that he dislikes any kind of interference with his administration and that the Government will introduce reforms immediately after his death. But from all accounts, although it is next to impossible to get any accurate information about the State, there will be almost nothing to reform after the Mir's decease and it is doubtful whether there is anything to reform now. Or, if suddenly the Government are awakened to the fearful mal-administration at Khairpur, the State may be quietly annexed and the heirs pensioned off. His Highness Mir Ali Murad, although an intelligent man, is passionately fond of sport and has sacrificed everything to this passion. Khairpur can be scarcely called a town and is in a state of decay. Miles and miles of arable land have been turned into game preserves, abounding with wild pigs, which devastate even cultivated areas and enjoy perfect immunity except from the Mir's hunting party. From year's end to year's end the Mir is absent from his capital and roams in the jungle shooting pigs and deer. People from Khairpur are constantly leaving the Mir's territory and settling at Sukkur and other places in British territory. The administration is not merely patriarchal, but of the most primitive and unsatisfactory kind. The administration of justice, the collection of revenue and the protection of the subjects are such as are never heard of in any State tributary to the British Government. We have never heard that in instances of this kind the feelings of the ruling Prince are alone consulted. If the State of Khairpur had been Mir Ali Murad's personal and self-acquired property he could have of course done what he liked with it. But it is only a trust which must go down to his heirs and the Government are partly responsible if the trust is abused. As it is, the next Mir of Khairpur will come in possession, if he does so at all, of some thousand square miles of jungle land, some million pigs, and a heavy debt. Compared with Khairpur, Kashmir, Bhopál and other States were models of good administration when interfered with. The Bombay Government deposed the Rána of Porbandar, although that State could not possibly have been worse administered than Khairpur. The result of the present policy of non-interference at Khairpur is that the Mir quakes in his shoes if he happens to offend the Collector of a district, conscious as he is of the mal-administration of his State. If the Government have made up their mind not to stir in the Mir's lifetime, then pressure from outside can alone make them move. It was not at their own instance that the Government moved in the Bhopál affair, or that Sir Lepel Griffin was given his congé. In that case Bhopál was suffering from the evils of interference. Khairpur is suffering from the evils of non-interference. But if detailed cases of mal-administration could be gathered and by the aid of such facts as may be available a case could be made out for a question in the House of Commons, the present policy of masterly inactivity might be abandoned and Government might see their way to save Khairpur from the utter ruin towards which it is hopelessly and certainly drifting.

Alleged mismanagement in the Pálitána State.

52. The Rájyabhakt (126), in its issue of the 14th May, complains of the prevalence of mismanagement in the Pálitána State, of its being in debt, of its servants making money anyhow and doing injustice and of His Highness the Thákor passing his time in pleasure and being powerless, and observes that looking to some of the petitions made to the Assistant Political Agent, Gohelvád, against the State, it is desirable that it should be entrusted to better hands. The paper refers to the petition made to the Assistant Political Agent by an old servant of the State named Maganlál Pánáchand for payment of Rs. 650, being the balance remaining due to him for his salary for 17 months from 2nd April 1887 to 2nd September 1888, and to the complaint made to the Piánt officer by a Rajput named Rupa Jetha, who is in the service of Prince Sámatsinghji, against the fine of Rs. 10 imposed upon him for crushing the leg of a she-goat under the wheels of his carriage, Rupa alleging that the charge against him is the result of spite, he being in the service of the Thákor's brother, and remarks that the Prant officer ought independently to enquire into the complaint instead of referring Rupa Jetha to the Diván. The paper adds that the family disputes, which are increasing, have done much harm to it, and draws the attention of the Bombay Government to it.

Mismanagement in Cambay and the necessity for Government interference.

53. The Khambát Samáchár (114), in its issue of the 17th May, complains once more of the prevalence of mismanagement and intrigues in Cambay, and of His Highness the Nawáb being given to pleasure and having given the management to the Diván, who is engaged in intrigues, and says that cholera has made its home permanently in Cambay, that the people suffer from scarcity of water and other troubles, and that it is necessary that Government should interfere and assume the administration for a time. [The Svadesh Bandhu (136), in its issue of the 15th May, refers to a case in which the Cambay police are alleged to have ill-treated and beaten some Boráhs while in custody on the 15th ultimo, to a charge being trumped against a Boráh on the same day, to the Boráhs having collected Rs. 6,000 with a view to petition the Political Agent and the Bombay Government, and to the Diván having through the head-priest of the Boráhs persuaded them to refrain from so doing, and observes that until the present Diván is replaced by another man the rottenness in the State will not be removed and that it is discreditable to Government to allow it to continue.]

Mismanagement in Dharampor and alleged cruelty upon two female prisoners.

54. The Broach Samáchár (93), in its issue of the 16th May, complains of the prevalence of mismanagement and intrigues in the Dharampor State and of the cruelty practised upon two female servants employed in the palace by their imprisonment since a few months past in ill-ventilated wooden cages in the palace compound on suspicion of thefts of jewellery, one of the prisoners having been once on the brink of death owing to want of ventilation, and says that the Diván ought at once to publicly enquire into the charges brought against them and release them on bail in the meantime or take them under his protection. The paper observes that the prisoners are said to have been the victims of some intrigues in the palace, which appear to have compelled the heir-apparent, Mohan Devji, to flee to Bulsár about four months ago, and calls the attention of the Rája, the State authorities and the Political Agent to the affair. [The Gujarát Darpan (75), in its issue of the 16th May, says that intrigues are on the increase in Dharampor, that intriguers are trying to foment quarrels in the royal family, and that the Political Agent should speedily stop them.]

The people and the Native States of Káthiáwár and a petition prepared by the editor and proprietor of the Rájyabhakt newspaper for presentation to His Excellency Lord Reay on their behalf.

55. The Rájyabhakt (126), in its issue of the 14th May, gives a further instalment of the petition prepared by its editor and proprietor for presentation to His Excellency Lord Reay on behalf of the people and Native Princes of Káthiáwár, complains of a very large number of men, girássiás and petty tálukdárs in Káthiáwár having been deprived of their land by powerful Native States with the help of the Political Agents and of their having got no redress either from the Political Department or the Government though the Honourable East India Company promised protection to them in a Resolution issued in 1803 and though Colonel Walker guaranteed protection to the landholders on behalf of the Honourable East India Company in 1808-9, suggests the appointment of a commission of inquiry, and remarks that if any tálukdár in Káthiáwár were to file a suit against Government they would have to pay him a large sum of money in consequence of the above-named guarantee given by Colonel Walker. The paper refers to the views expressed by Colonel Barr on the 8th June 1854 regarding the necessity for the Political Agent protecting petty tálukdárs and girássiás from the tyranny of powerful tálukdárs (vide page 106 of the Bombay Government Reports, No. 37, New Series), and observes that notwithstanding this if the Political Agents have not duly protected them and ruined them, the Government ought to enquire into the matter. The paper adds that the changes introduced into Káthiáwár by Colonel Keatinge in 1863 have done no good to the province, but have done harm.

The Porbandar Show pronounced a gratifying success.

56. The Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 15th May, conveys thanks to Mr. Lely, the Administrator, for the Porbandar Show, records the gratifying success of the Show, and exhorts other Native States of Káthiáwár to hold similar exhibitions in their respective territories and to benefit their subjects by affording due encouragement to the long-neglected arts and manufactures of the province.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

The proposed abolition of the presidency armies in India and the India Council.

1. In alluding to the fear alleged to be entertained by the India Council that if a Bill were brought before Parliament for the abolition of the presidency armies in order to carry into effect the proposal submitted by the Government of India on the subject of the proposed army corps system, Messrs. Bradlaugh, Caine and other advocates of the rights and privileges of the Natives might try and succeed in introducing into the Administration Act of 1858 certain provisions in the interests of the natives of India, and in referring to the supposition that for this reason the India Council have thought it discreet to let things alone for the present at least, the Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 20th May, says:—It is much to be regretted that through such a fear as this the authorities should desist from introducing a much needed reform. The Natives are anxious for this reform, as it would lessen to some extent the cost of the army and consequently the burden of taxation. It is beneficial to the State that the Natives should interest themselves in the efficiency and progress of the army, but on account of the persistent refusal of Government to appoint Natives to higher posts in the army, or for some other reasons, they do not take that interest and they are not to blame for their unconcern.

The rumoured infliction of a Wheat Frauds Act on India condemned.

2. The Nagar Samáchár (44), in its issue of the 18th May, writes:—The merchants in England are trying hard to get a Wheat Frauds Act passed so as to force the wheat merchants of India to lessen the impurities in wheat. This enactment, if passed, will be a powerful engine of oppression and injustice. Do the Indian wheat merchants force the English merchants to buy their impure commodity? It is a matter of mutual pleasure. If English merchants do not like to purchase Indian wheat, they may not do so. They may buy a better kind of wheat in any other market. If the sellers of impure wheat are to be punished by the proposed Act, the buyers ought also to come in for their share. They buy, with their eyes open, a commodity which they know to be impure. Why should they buy it? But it is better to be forewarned. If our Indian agriculturists and merchants think of lessening the impurities in wheat, it will not be a difficult task. Let them do it and then the agitation of selfish merchants in England will have no power to harm their interests.

High postal rates between England and India.

3. The Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 21st May, and the Akhbáre Sodágar (86), in that of the 22nd idem, express heartfelt gratitude to Mr. Henniker Heaton, M.P., for his exertions to obtain a reduction in the high rates of postage on letters and newspapers to India, and hope that the Honourable Member's exertions will be crowned with success, removing the flagrant injustice done to India and affording due encouragement to the increase of commerce and epistolary and literary intercommunication between her and England.

The administration of India by the British found fault with.

4. In an article headed "Signs of the impending extinction of the British rule in India," the Anonymous (88), in its issue of the 19th May, writes:—Innumerable are the obligations under which the British rulers are laid by the Native Rájás and the people of this country. But if the latter had known that they would be so ill-repaid for their fidelity they would certainly have never helped the English at the time when the tables seemed likely to turn against them in 1857. Scindia never dreamt that his invaluable help at a most critical moment would be repaid by the English by appropriating his treasury after his demise, by neglecting the care of his son, and by creating discontent in his dominions. Holkar never thought that his son would be insulted. The Nizám never entertained a suspicion that the Berárs would be swallowed up by the British and his State opened up as a field for European adventurers. Khanderáo Mahárája of Baroda had no idea that his brother Malhár Ráo would die a prisoner. If the present wretched condition of Oudh, the Panjáb, Kolhápur, Jhánsi, Rewah, Gwalior, Burmah, Baroda, Mysore, Por-bandar, Hyderabad and other small and large States could have been known beforehand and anticipated, the Delhi Darbár and the great éclat with which Her Majesty the Queen of England was declared the Empress of India would never have been historical facts. The annexation of Burmah, the frequent insults heaped on sovereign heads in India, the stringent enforcement of the Arms Act, the misappropriation of the famine relief fund, the tax on a prime necessary of life like salt, the activity of the A'bkári Department, the practice of supplying prostitutes to European soldiers, and other acts too numerous to mention which run counter to the dictates of Christian religion, which are against morality and which defy the injunctions of the Almighty God, appear to us to indicate that the British sun is not to shine very long. Our rulers, if they wish to continue to rule over us, must faithfully fulfil the promises made from time to time. They should not keep an evil eye on the wealth of the Rájás and the people of this country. The deprivation of Theebaw, the appropriation of the jewellery and territories of Dhulipsing, the deposition of the ruler of Kashmere, the discontent in Bhopál, the condonation of the offences of Sir Lepel Griffin and other unjust actions of Government go to justify the title of our article. We heartily hope that the pure conscience of England will be soon awakened, that the people of this country will be governed in a Christian spirit, and that our guesses will be soon falsified.

The Indian National Congress and the Pársis.

5. The Kannadă Suvárte (142), in its issue of the 17th May, writes:—Last year a split in the Indian National Congress camp had occurred by the separation of a large part of the Mahomedans, who were led to offer an ill-considered opposition to the Congress on purely sentimental and groundless objections. Nevertheless the success of the national movement was a marked one. This year again a similar danger threatens the movement from the Pársi quarter. Dr. Vicajee, a respectable member of the Pársi community, has sounded a note of warning to his co-religionists, calling upon them to pause and think before they join the Congress. His objections to the Pársis joining the movement look plausible at first sight. But they are based upon incorrect notions of loyalty and nationality. That the Pársis are merely a set of foreign settlers and their nationality is distinctly different from that of the Hindus is a fact which admits of no doubt. But it is not sufficient to furnish that community with a plea for keeping itself aloof from the Congress. If it were possible for the Pársis to return to Persia and regain their power and influence, they might well have considered themselves as mere sojourners in this land. But under the present circumstances their fate is closely bound up with that of the rest of the Natives. It would therefore be very imprudent on their part to sever their connection with a movement which concerns the interests of all the communities of India. The Congressionists, however, have little to fear from this threatened separation of the Pársis. Their opposition, however significant, will not lessen the importance of the Congress much as the last year's split did not come at all in the way of its success. Besides, the most influential and leading members of the Pársi community have all along shown their sympathy with the movement and have given their hearty co-operation for furthering its cause. It is, however, highly desirable that there should be perfect unanimity in such matters as the Congress deals with. We therefore hope that our Pársi friends will consider well their position before they take the decided step of disuniting themselves from the promoters of the Congress.

6. In connection with the advice tendered by a few Pársis and Pársi newspapers that the Pársis should not join the fifth Indian National Congress to be held in Bombay next December, the Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 24th May, says:—The sympathy of the general Pársi community is with the Congress and the above advice proceeds from a few isolated individuals who have not been able to show that the aims and the mode of working of the Congress are improper, but who, on the other hand, accept them as quite just. Properly speaking, these advisers only fear that there is a probability of the interests of the Pársis not being advanced by joining the movement. The fear is quite groundless, it being entertained on the imaginary supposition that the Congress might hereafter proceed upon improper lines and become disloyal to Government. These advisers, moreover, assert that the Pársis are foreigners in India and therefore need not join any Native movements. But the Pársis are, in fact, better Natives than the Mahomedans and did not allow a similar attempt made by the Anglo-Indians in connection with the Ilbert Bill to produce any effect on their minds. India is the adoptive mother-country of the Pársis, who should continue to join all legitimate movements for the advancement of her interests as they have hitherto done.

7. The Gujarát Darpan (75), in its issue of the 23rd May, writes:— A propos of the threatened Pársi secession from the Indian National Congress, we are unable to follow without a smile the line of argument adopted by the Bombay Rást Goftár who has begun to play the rôle of a sympathetic anti-Congressionist, if we may be allowed to use the expression. The mere dogmatic assertion that it is not beneficial to the Pársis to join the Congress, without any solid arguments to support it but founded on vague premises, should, we think, carry no weight either with the community in question or the public at large. It is admitted that the Congress is a good thing in itself; its ways are loyal, but because the customs, manners and traditions of the Pársis are different, as their interests are different and their loyalty to the British Ráj different, it is impossible for them to join the Congress. Let us examine if these are valid grounds and if the writer has not begged the question. By a contact of near 1,200 years the social customs, manners and habits of the Pársis have received more of a Hindu impress than any other, though the race has managed to preserve its individuality. If one take the trouble of travelling in the Surat District, he cannot but be struck with having little to differentiate between the Pársis and the Hindus. As to whether the interests of the Pársis are different, we have shown in a recent issue of ours that they are not. Does our contemporary think that as the Pársis are a more advanced race they would suffer if they join backward Hindus? Does he at all entertain the idea that Government will grant his community special privileges for their special interests, if they are any? If he think so, he is greatly mistaken. What then does he ask his community to do after it has abstained from taking any part in the Congress? Unless this question is answered satisfactorily, we consider that he cannot in justice ask the Pársis to take the step he wants them to do. Their political traditions of the last fifty years are against such an action. Their much-vaunted loyalty, too, is not of a kind superior to that of the Hindus and the Mahomedans. Let us ask our contemporary if the Pársis enjoyed no political power in the times of Hindu and Mahomedan supremacy, and if they did, as history proves, why they cannot come under the category of conquered races as much as the Hindus and the Mahomedans. The reason shown by him for Pársi loyalty is nothing but flimsy. There being not much to differentiate the Pársis from the rest of the natives of India, they can assimilate themselves with the other races of India on the platform of politics, and even if there be anything to do so, it is prejudicial to their interests if they do not join the other races. We hope the hubbub that is raised by unthinking minds for severing the Pársis from the Congress will subside ere long.

The second meeting of the Provincial Congress at Poona.

8. In noticing the second meeting of the Provincial Congress recently held at Poona, the Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 24th May, says:—Among the subjects discussed at this meeting was that of village sanitation, on which valuable suggestions have been made, which, if adopted, would remove much of the anxiety entertained in connection with the measure. The meeting expressed approval of the course taken by the Bombay Government in connection with the Crawford Commission, and conveyed the thanks of the public to the local Administration. This step of the Congress has proved distasteful to many Europeans and a few Natives, but it is no less true that the same duly represents public opinion on the subject. The Provincial Congress is an appropriate movement for the due representation of the wants and wishes of the people of this presidency, and ought to have district and táluka branches. [The Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the same date, expresses similar sentiments, recording its disapproval of the opinion expressed by the Congress on the Crawford case, and repeating that the Bombay Government committed several serious blunders in connection with the enquiry, unnecessarily causing a heavy loss to the treasury.]

The present policy of retrenchment condemned and the re-imposition of the import duties on cotton goods recommended.

9. The Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 20th May, writes:—It is to be greatly regretted that the Bombay Government should have been compelled to levy forced contributions from urban and rural boards for the purpose of finding some relief from the exigencies of the financial situation. It would be more statesmanlike if, instead of resorting to such petty devices and makeshifts for saving a farthing here and a farthing there, the local Governments and the Supreme Government reviewed the whole financial situation in a calm and sober spirit, and found out some other way of meeting the difficulty,—a way which will not be open to the reproach of being characterized as undignified and mean. So far as the general taxable resources of the country are concerned it would seem that they have been exhausted with the imposition of the hated income-tax and the enhancement of the equally unpopular salt-duty. There would thus seem to be no other financial expedient open to Government than the import cotton duties, the re-imposition of which has been of late frequently urged on the attention of the Indian and English authorities. Many useful reforms in the Indian administration have been delayed for want of funds, and it is highly necessary that they should not be further put off for want of resources, when such resources can be immediately secured by the re-imposition of the import cotton duties, at least as a temporary measure. It is to be hoped that the Government of India will at an early date review the financial situation and apply the remedy at once.

10. A correspondent of the Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 23rd May, says:—The successful attack made by Messrs. Samuel Smith and Caine in Parliament on the Indian ábkári policy had led the public to expect that from the 1st of August next the importation of inferior European spirits would be discouraged and the consumption of genuine country drinks manufactured from mowra flowers, dates, coarse sugar, grapes, &c., would be encouraged by increasing the duty on the former and lessening the duty levied on the latter; but Government have adopted a course quite the reverse of these expectations. The duty levied on Europe spirits has been allowed to remain what it was, while that on underproof healthy country drinks has been raised by eight annas per gallon, and the license fee of country liquor-shops increased by one and a half times the old amount. This is evidently a disregard of the high authority of Parliament. Sir Richard Temple and other members on the side of Government asserted in Parliament that a heavy ábkári duty was levied in order to discourage the consumption of spirituous drinks, but the fact is the reverse of it. There has been an increase in the consumption of liquor every year, bringing in correspondingly increased revenue to Government. Government try to show that the vice of intoxication has lessened, but it is not so. Since the spirituous drinks have been made very dear by a heavy increase in the duty, intoxication has largely increased, as is proved by the convictions for getting drunk and disorderly on the records of the magistracy of the Thána District. In addition to drinking for the sake of enjoyment the lower classes of the people use liquor on the anniversaries of their deceased relatives and on festive occasions, and obtain it even by incurring debt and exposing themselves to various privations.

The argument for increase of salaries to European officers in India refuted.

11. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 20th May, writes:—The Crawford case has been taken by some English papers as a text for an argument for increase of salaries of European officers in India. Mr. Crawford's borrowings, it is argued, were necessitated by his salary being inadequate. A more perverse inference could not have been drawn. The writers either do not know or forget the fact that Mr. Crawford's extravagance was phenomenal, that his impecuniousness was chronic and habitual, and that the vice grew upon him with age. His living was so abnormally reckless that the wealth of Plutus or our own Kuber could not have sufficed to keep him out of debt. It must be said to the credit of the Indian Civil Service that men of the type of Mr. Crawford are the exceptions and not the rule. The salaries are usually found to be so high, especially in the higher grades, that with all high living of Europeans in this country they are able to amass sufficiently large fortunes and are able to retire on comfortable incomes. It is a strange irony of fate that while we in India are complaining that the salaries of Europeans are too high, the press in England raises a cry that they are too low. In fact the Indian Civil Service is one of the most highly paid services in the world. Its cost is already felt to be an insupportable burden on our finances, and one of the most difficult problems every Indian statesman has to grapple with is how best to reduce the cost of our administration. In face of this, to propose that the salaries should be increased seems to us the height of perversity.

The proposed increase in the salary of the Inspector-General of Forests disapproved.

12. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 19th May, writes:—While public institutions are being starved for want of funds, the Secretary of State for India has sanctioned an increase in the salary of the Inspector-General of Forests by Rs. 300, and a fat berth under the name of the Inspector-General of Ábkári is in a fair way of being created. That while the local Governments should be asked to exercise stringent economy even at the cost of departmental efficiency the Supreme Government should be liberal enough to enjoy the luxury of a fat berth is indeed surprising. When there was a famine in China a few years ago the Imperial expenditure there was cut down by half, but with us things are done in a different fashion. The ábkári revenue is collected by all provincial departments and credited to the supreme treasury, and we fail to see the necessity for the new post unless a strong hankering after the multiplication of new appointments be at the bottom.

Death of Colonel Osborne considered a loss to India.

13. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 19th May, writes:—"R. D. O." is dead. He who figured so long in the columns of the Calcutta Statesman and made his individuality felt by all is now gone out of this world, and we shall long miss his vigorous, trenchant and withal just criticisms. Colonel Osborne did not give any personal help to the Indian National Congress movement, but as a third party he was a very valuable ally. His most recent observations were against the policy of the Government of India towards the Native States of India. We are sorry to lose such a staunch friend who would have rendered us considerable help at this most interesting period, when the people of India are but learning to appreciate their rights and are fighting for them. He was a thorough hater of the Indian bureaucracy.

14. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 20th May, writes:—Another sad death we have to mourn is that of the late Colonel R. D. Osborne. The late Colonel was one of the few sincere friends India has had in England. Like Major Evans Bell his service in India belongs to a time when India was an object of the deepest suspicion and anxiety to Englishmen. His liberality of mind was all the more remarkable, since at a time when most Englishmen lost the balance of their minds and grew furious over the wrongs, or supposed wrongs, which their countrymen had suffered he kept his head cool and his heart warm, and maintained throughout a steady and earnest attachment for India which is not often met with. He was an author and journalist of no mean repute, and the familiar initials of R.D.O. will long be missed by the readers of the Calcutta Statesman. India can ill-afford to lose such fast friends as Colonel Osborne. His example may induce other noble Englishmen to work in the same cause, but the singleness of purpose and the hearty and disinterested love with which he worked will seldom be equalled and will never be surpassed.

Death of Father Damien regretted and the necessity for the segregation of lepers in India pointed out.

15. The Gujaráti (77), in its issue of the 19th May, writes:—The death of Father Damien at Molokai will evoke feelings of universal sorrow and admiration. His life was indeed a life of heroic self-sacrifice rarely equalled in the annals of martyrdom. He suffered voluntary banishment in the colony of lepers with the certainty of contracting the terrible disease. He, however, did his work with a sympathy, kindness, heroic resignation and calmness that are beyond all human praise. His painful and lingering death proves beyond all doubt that leprosy is a contagious disease, and we hope that the Government of India will take speedy and effective measures for the segregation of lepers in this country. The presence of these unfortunate wretches in the vicinity of public institutions and in overcrowded localities and thoroughfares is a standing disgrace to the country, and if the evil is not vigorously grappled with, the consequences of a Laissez faire policy will be simply disastrous to the health of its teeming population.

16. The Rást Goftár (82), in its issue of the 19th May, writes:—Father Damien's death will unfortunately support the arguments of those who believe in the contagiousness of leprosy, and the good man would not have died in vain if his end had been to serve as a warning and a lesson to those governments and municipalities in the world which have hitherto neglected to take stringent measures for stamping out the great evil. The Bombay Government and the Bombay Municipality are among the greatest sinners in this respect. We have a colony of lepers in our midst. They go about freely. They buy and sell. They marry and give in marriage, and propagate the disease quite as they please. Attention was lately called to the subject by Mr. Kirkham in a very effective speech in the Bombay Municipal Corporation, and we hope the death of Father Damien will stimulate the city to the adoption of stringent measures of segregation.

Proposed grant of a pension to Mr. Crawford condemned and the injustice thereof pointed out.

17. The Indu Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 20th May, writes:—We have no wish to be unduly severe upon Mr. Crawford. We admit his services have been brilliant, that his fall has been uncommonly severe, and that one's natural sentiment under the circumstances is to pity the man and to wish that, whatever his failings, he should not be left unprovided for. On the other hand, it must be remembered that conduct which Mr. Crawford is found guilty of, not to speak of what is popularly believed against him, calls for exemplary punishment, especially in the case of a man of the exalted position of Mr. Crawford. The deleterious influence of Mr. Crawford's example needs hardly to be described. The demoralization of the whole administration and the utter loss of prestige and confidence of the Government among the people have been fittingly recognized by Sir Raymond West in his able minute. In prosecuting and punishing Mr. Crawford the chief object was not to correct Mr. Crawford, for he is beyond correction, but to correct the service and to signify the displeasure of Government in such a manner that like offences may not be perpetrated in future. This object is sure to be frustrated if a pension of £400 (which, be it noted, comes to about Rs. 6,800 a year, a sum larger than the highest pension attainable by a Native after the best service) be granted to Mr. Crawford. Further, the stealthy manner in which Mr. Crawford has eventually left the country, leaving a host of claims unsatisfied and defrauding the people of this presidency to the extent of krors of rupees puts the Government and the European community in by no means an enviable position. What can all the best service in the world avail against such conduct? [The Gujarát Mitră (78) of the 19th, and the Hitechchhu (79) of Ahmedabad and the Gujarát Gazette (76) of the 23rd May, also condemn the proposed grant of a pension to Mr. Crawford and doubt whether a Native similarly circumstanced would have been thus treated with kindness. The Gujarát Mitră takes the Conservatives to task for their attack on His Excellency Lord Reay in the matter of the Crawford case and for the partiality which, it alleges, they show towards the European accused in India, and says that such conduct of theirs is improper and has tarnished the fair name of British justice, and that they should well bear in mind that if an association or a learned well-wisher of the people were to come forward and to collect all the cases of European accused persons in India and the decisions given therein, to publish them in the form of a book and to distribute copies thereof throughout England, France, Russia, Austria, Germany and America, the policy pursued by British officers would be condemned, the good name and fame of the British rule would be lost, and the British would fall in public estimation. It adds that the Conservatives would be very fortunate if they were to keep this thing in mind, that the British are lucky in having such officers as Lords Ripon and Reay, who pacify the annoyed Indian public and protect their honour, and that it is owing to them that the Native public is quiet and does not wish ill of the Government. The Hitechchhu observes that the boast regarding the impartial administration of justice in the British rule is false, that the law itself observes race distinctions inasmuch as European offenders can claim to be tried by European jurors and as Civilians can only be tried by a Commission, however grave their offence, and that the public has seen in a few recent cases how Europeans try to protect their co-religionists, refers to the case of Mr. Beames, of Mr. Sullivan, a member of the Madras Executive Council, of Mr. Wilson, late Political Agent, Cambay, and of Mr. Arthur Crawford, and strongly disapproves of the attacks made by European public writers upon persons exposing their countrymen and upon the Judges trying them and of the attack made upon His Excellency Lord Reay in the matter of the Crawford case. It adds that if a pension be granted to Mr. Crawford, many Europeans will extort large sums of money as bribe from the people and will leave the service with a pension and with their ill-gotten gains in case they are found out, and that it is very probable that the Secretary of State for India will sanction the proposal for grant of pension, even if it be assumed that the proposal is made by Government out of pity and not out of fear for the uproar set up by Europeans in favour of Mr. Crawford. The Gujarát Gazette remarks that it would be creditable to the Government of His Excellency Lord Reay and to the Europeans if they were to help Mr. Crawford out of their private purse and not from the public treasury, that when the Government pity Mr. Crawford why do they not pity thousands of families in this country who are being every day reduced to a worse condition than Mr. Crawford's, and that the moral of the whole affair is in accordance with the proverb that the right hand only turns towards the mouth.]

18. The Hindu Punch (31), in its issue of the 23rd May, says:—Mr. Crawford hardly deserves any pension. For more than thirty years he has been fattening himself in India. Lákhs of rupees he obtained and spent. Without the least shame and compunction he sold off in the regular bazar fashion the highest posts in his Division. He stigmatised the fair name of the British Government and the fairer name of the Civil Service to which he belonged. The Bombay Government is his enemy and he takes care to let the world know that it is vindictively ruining him, and yet he comes before it and claims a pension! If Government will grant him a pension,—him who seduced the wives of his brother-officers and took bribes,—then surely the hard-earned money of the helpless rayat is being utterly wasted. No good government will like to be considered a party to the sinister interests of its immoral and shameless servants. One question in this case is whether Mrs. Crawford deserves to get any allowance. To this question our answer is that Mr. Crawford's two sons are in India and they are very highly-paid servants of the State. It is their duty to see that their mother gets sufficient to live upon in England. We heartily wish this Crawford affair ends soon. It is disgusting—positively sickening. Mr. Maclean, M.P., and men of his kind are girding up their loins to fight for Mr. Crawford. Let them do whatever they like; we know what they will achieve.

Grant of a pension to Mr. Crawford approved.

19. The Bakul (22), in its issue of the 19th May, says:—If the rumour that Mr. Crawford is to get a pension of four hundred pounds per annum be true, then it can be said that the Bombay Government has done a very graceful thing indeed. We hear that Mr. Baumann, M. P., is working for Mr. Crawford in Parliament, but we think that the recommendation of the Bombay Government will be of greater use to Mr. Crawford than any efforts on the part of members of Parliament like Mr. Baumann. Nobody in the presidency will have the cruel heart to refuse a compassionate allowance to a man like Mr. Crawford. But if Mr. Crawford is to get a pension, the Mámlatdárs must also be reinstated in their former positions. To forsake them at the end will hardly be a good policy on the part of Government.

20. The Yajdán Parast (141), in its issue of the 19th May, expresses approval of the proposal alleged to have been made by the Bombay Government for granting a small pension to Mr. Crawford, and remarks that the public will with one voice approve of the resolution of Government to show mercy to him, and that it is to be hoped that they will also show mercy and favour in a case in which a Native may be concerned. [The Surat Akhbár (83), in its issue of the 20th May, says that the proposed grant of a pension to Mr. Crawford by the Bombay Government shows the latter to be pure and large-minded.]

21. The Sudhárak (17), in its issue of the 20th May, writes :—It is a good thing to have a feeling heart. But we ought not to be prepared to override all notions of real and adequate justice in obedience to the promptings of such a heart. We feel for Mrs. Crawford as much as anybody else, but we cannot allow this feeling of pity to come in the way of our protesting against any compassionate allowance being granted to her. The Bombay Gazette says : "There was fair ground for urging that the claims of Mrs. Crawford to the pension which would have been indefeasibly her right, had she been widowed a year ago, should not be over-ridden by the course which the Government has since deemed it its duty to take. This view has been influentially urged upon the Government, and it is likely that a pension of the usual amount will be accorded to Mr. (Mrs. ?) Crawford for subsistence." We do not know what these influential quarters are from which this view has gone up to Government. But we cannot help saying that whosoever, out of a wrong tender-heartedness, urges this view upon the Government, makes an effort to unjustly fleece the tax-payer. If it was the duty of any one to care for Mrs. Crawford, evidently it was her husband's. It is but fair to assume that she was the sharer of all his former glory and that she might have profited by his ill-gotten gains, and it is therefore but just that she should now suffer the consequences of his misconduct. If Mr. Crawford had retired from the service, or had even died, before this terrible exposure took place, it would have been a fraud successfully played on the public till the end—one of those many cases where crime escapes detection and the criminal in consequence remains in full enjoyment of what he has unlawfully or immorally acquired. The reward which is and ought to be reserved for meritorious service alone would have been obtained in that case, but obtained without being deserved. The tax-payer would have been in that case defrauded, but defrauded with his eyes shut. But now the fraud is detected. The Bombay Government is convinced of the delinquencies of the man. We cannot therefore allow ourselves to be fleeced so openly. What claims has Mrs. Crawford on the tax-payers of the Bombay Presidency except as the wife of Mr. Crawford ? It has been proved that this man has done enormous disservice to the province. He has been the cause of perverting the morals of a large body of public servants and of discrediting the system of administration in the presidency, and he has further been the cause of the pecuniary ruin of a large number of individuals. Surely this is no service worthy of reward, and the wife of such a man, howsoever she may deserve to be pitied, can have no claim on the money of the tax-payer and must perforce be content to share the lot of her husband.

Mr. Crawford's application for a re-imbursement of the costs incurred by him in his defence approved.

22. The Sind Times (5), in its issue of the 15th May, writes :—Mr. Crawford, the ex-Commissioner, has applied to be paid the expenses of the defence he was recently compelled to conduct at Poona. We think he is justly entitled to a moiety of the expenses, in so far as those incurred in defending himself on the graver charges of corruption and bribery are concerned. He has been acquitted by the Commission, and the acquittal has had Lord Cross's approval, regardless of the opinion His Excellency Lord Reay and the Honourable Sir R. West have expressed on the Commission's report; but as long as the tribunal appointed to try him has declared Mr. Crawford not guilty, and as long as this decision has received the approval of Lord Cross, Mr. Crawford is justly entitled to claim and receive compensation. If every officer (be he high in service or a mere subordinate) were to be similarly tried on evidence of the kind brought forward before the Commission, and thereby compelled to place himself on his defence, there would be no end of trials by commission. We do not for a moment wish to insinuate that Lord Reay's action was in any way hasty or uncalled for. What we wish to impress upon those concerned in considering Mr. Crawford's application is, that once an officer is acquitted in the manner Mr. Crawford has been, the amende honorable should be made in order to compensate him for his heavy pecuniary loss. Mr. Crawford has been dismissed for heavy indebtedness, and we do not for a moment suggest that the expenses incurred by him in defending that part of the proceedings should also be refunded to him. No better precedent can be quoted than the case of Mr. Wilson, of Cambay notoriety. In that case, we believe, a reimbursement was made of all the expenses he incurred in his defence.

The moral from the Crawford case pointed out.

23. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 19th May, writes:—The truest and wisest moral of the Crawford case appears to us to have been pointed out by Mr. Caine, M. P., in the following words, as if by anticipation, for these words were written and published early in 1888, when nobody knew or heard anything of that case:—"Briefly, what educated India desires is representation in all the departments and governing bodies which control the destinies of their country. If they had fairplay in the Civil Service, representation on their own Legislative Councils and on the India Council at home, and if it were possible to induce some English constituency to accept one of their number, they would be more than content, while the advantage to Indian society of being able to discuss every grievance publicly in all the governing bodies which rule their destinies would be beyond all measure." We advisedly say that this is the truest and wisest moral which the Government can draw from the Crawford scandal; for, under the state of things therein indicated, it would be very difficult for one adverse influence, however potent, to vitiate the entire administrative machinery in any large division or province; it would certainly be impossible for such a scandal to germinate, grow and flourish unsuspected and unknown till it should assume proportions which, by their very magnitude, appear incredible to those not personally cognizant of or affected by it in one way or another. Let this moral, therefore, be well pondered over by those English politicians and publicists who value their good name or the prestige of their rule in India.

The Mámlatdárs concerned in the Crawford case.

24. The Mahrátta (2), in its issue of the 19th May, writes:—We know that there has been a cry in certain quarters against those that have come forward and confessed the truth. But we warn Government against mistaking the same for real public opinion. It is a sectional and a party cry, raised by the partizans of Mr. Crawford and by the friends of those who hold that the honest confession of one's weakness is far more culpable than the weakness itself. Government have hitherto tried to keep clear of both these parties, and we urge upon their attention the necessity for adhering honestly to the same path of duty. No one denies that the Native subordinates have, as a class, exhibited great weakness. But the way to remedy it is not to hang those who had at least the courage and honesty to come forward and openly confess their faults. The chance is that Government might thereby lose their best hands, while the worse offenders will prosper. Of course if there are any independent cases of corruption they should be at once taken up and the offenders brought to justice. No one would be sorry for it. What we say is that it is perfectly unsafe, nay mischievous, to draw such fine distinctions as that between those who offered to pay and those who consented to pay with regard to the corruption prevalent in Mr. Crawford's time. Government at present have no materials to do so, and even if they have, it is extremely doubtful if they would be able to do anything like justice in this matter. They cannot again forget the fact that they have after all to govern through Native agency. We hope, therefore, that they will give up the unprofitable, mischievous and unjust attempt of distinguishing between the various cases and be prepared to pass a wet sponge over the past, taking due care to see that the subordinates are kept under "happier influences" hereafter. Nothing more is possible under the circumstances, if we must keep the honour of our word and if we must care to see that the innocents are not put to unmerited loss and degradation. [The Hitechchhu (79) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 23rd May, says that the Mámlatdárs concerned in the Crawford case should not be punished at all, as they cannot be held to have given bribes when the receiver thereof has been acquitted on that charge and as they are not guilty of giving bribes but of giving money under strong pressure, that the object of Mr. Crawford's friends in having them punished is to deter Natives from giving evidence of any kind whatever against Europeans so that the latter may fearlessly indulge in injustice, oppression, bribery and other vices and escape scotfree from the consequences thereof, and that the Government should think well whether such a course would be beneficial to themselves and their subjects.]

25. The Kesari (38), in its issue of the 21st May, says :—The Mámlatdárs are out of the reach of the power of Government to harm them. The conditions on which they were allowed to escape the punishment to which they were liable by reason of their guilt have been strictly fulfilled by them and therefore they cannot be harmed. This is not our opinion. This is the opinion of a member of His Excellency the Governor's Council, one of the most experienced and learned of the Civil Servants. If Government are thinking of doing any harm to the Mámlatdárs, then surely they are courting unmitigated unpopularity and disgrace. To find out who offered to pay and who consented to pay, to separate the victims and the dupes from the rascals and the cheats, is a very difficult and delicate task and would hardly serve any useful purpose of Government. The shade of difference between the guilt of the two classes is faint. The whole atmosphere was vitiated. It is not just that those who confessed their crime should be punished while those who had the hardihood to remain silent and who could not be prosecuted for want of evidence should remain in the full glory of their position. To take away the powers of the self-incriminated Mámlatdárs or to otherwise degrade them in the eyes of the public is akin to punishing the innocent and rewarding the guilty. We hope His Excellency Lord Reay will not be a party to a scheme under which such a farce of justice and morality will take place. Again, look at the inconsistency which is apparent. The Mámlatdárs say in their evidence that they gave bribes to Mr. Crawford. The Commissioners do not believe in this evidence and acquit Mr. Crawford on the charge of taking bribes. The Secretary of State for India confirms the decision. Then why should not the Bombay Government accept the Secretary of State's finding ? If, on the count of taking bribes, Mr. Crawford is found innocent, why should the poor Mámlatdárs be found guilty and punished ? Consider the position from any point of view, the most honourable way to get out of the difficulty is to stick fast to the promises solemnly given.

26. The Poona Vaibhav (48), in its issue of the 19th May, writes :—We advise the Government not to persist in making any more disgusting exposures and to bury the Crawford case deep in the ground. No end will be served by unnecessarily harassing the unfortunate Mámlatdárs. The present position is that those Mámlatdárs who have confessed their crimes are being harassed by the High Court of Bombay and the Supreme Government, and those who have been reticent about their misdeeds are being hunted up by the Bombay Government. Even granting that those who have not confessed are really guilty, are they to be punished because out of shame they sealed their mouths ? In our opinion those who stuck fast to the resolution not to forsake their master, Mr. Crawford, and aggravate his guilt by their self-incriminating statements are more faithful to the salt they ate and have better heart than those who, as soon as they saw Mr. Crawford's sun was set, came shamelessly forward to bear evidence to his guilt. The former deserve a better fate than the latter. We heartily wish that Government should stop this sickening case. The prestige of Government depends now upon their silence.

27. The Pratod (51), in its issue of the 20th May, makes the following suggestion to the Government of Bombay regarding the self-incriminated Mámlatdárs in the Crawford case :—The Mámlatdárs who have criminated themselves by their confessions should only be given third-class magisterial powers. The first and second class magisterial powers should be taken away from them and given to Subordinate Judges. The reason why the Mámlatdárs should have third-class powers is that without such powers the work of collection of revenue will not be carried on properly. By such an arrangement the people will also be benefited and the pressure of work in the Revenue Department will be lessened. The first principle of good administration, viz., the separation of the judicial and the executive functions, will be respected. The Mámlatdárs will get their deserts, and the claims of justice will be satisfied. We hope therefore that His Excellency Lord Reay will give heed to our suggestion and carry it into practice.

Praise of His Excellency Lord Reay and grounds for applying for extension of his term of office pointed out.

28. The Subodh Patrika (16), in its issue of the 19th May, writes :—There is now barely one year left before His Excellency Lord Reay will complete his term of office, and we submit it is time to contemplate what steps should be taken to secure an extension of it. It is beyond question that it is many years since Bombay has had a Governor so conscientious, able and firm, and assisted by a partner who has not only maintained what is a first essential to their position,—a severely moral tone at court,—but has also evinced an intelligent interest in the welfare of her Native sisters. Moreover, as a contemporary has pointed out, His Excellency has by a conjuncture of circumstances been led into a clearer insight into the administrative machinery and its virtues and failings than falls to the lot of Governors generally, and even for that reason a prolongation of his rule is desirable in the interests of good government. But this ground is further re-enforced by the consideration that if any changes are to be introduced—and some changes are unavoidable—no one would be in a better position to inaugurate them with the best chances of success than Lord Reay. These are among the reasons which render it desirable that the period of his rule over us should be extended beyond the usual limit.

Extension of His Excellency Lord Reay's office as Governor of Bombay pronounced unlikely.

29. The Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 25th May, says :—Some persons in Bombay and the second meeting of the Provincial Congress recently held at Poona are said to be prepared to submit a memorial to the Home Government praying for an extension of the period of His Excellency Lord Reay's office as Governor of Bombay, but they had better think over and see if their prayer is likely to be granted. His Lordship is, no doubt, highly popular and deserves the concession, but the same is not likely to be made, since a similar prayer made by the whole of India in the case of Lord Ripon was not attended to by the Home authorities. The admirers of Lord Reay's administration ought to perpetuate his memory by raising an appropriate memorial by public subscriptions.

Mr. Pritchard's departure from Sind hailed with joy and Sind congratulated on its being relieved of an unpopular officer.

30. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 15th May, writes :—We sincerely wish both Mr. Pritchard and this province joy : to Mr. Pritchard on his departure (which will be permanent, let us hope), and to Sind on being relieved of his administration. No contrast can be keener than that between Mr. Erskine's administration and Mr. Pritchard's. We may credit Mr. Pritchard with good intentions and with honesty ; but that is all. His unforgivingness, narrowness of ideas and absolutism, all go to form a character sadly "dashed with wandering isles of night." The little good, if any, that he has been able to do is purely accidental. Our contemporary of the Indian Spectator protested against Mr. Pritchard's translation to the Governor's Council, but had the unkindness to be agreeable to his remaining at his post in Sind. We think that while in the Council Mr. Pritchard would be only one man open to correction and contradiction, in a province like Sind he could have his way in almost every thing. We gladly make a present of Mr. Pritchard to the Council, and trust that his leave-taking from Sind will be a final one.

Remarks on the report on the working of hospitals and charitable dispensaries in the Bombay Presidency during 1888.

31. In noticing the annual report on the working of hospitals and charitable dispensaries in the Bombay Presidency during the year 1888, the Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 20th May, writes :—It is to be regretted that sufficient care is not taken for the free distribution of cholera pills and mixture in the different towns and villages of the presidency for being supplied gratis to indigent persons attacked by the epidemic. The Surgeon-General has recommended that the presidency town should be provided with a big hospital for the treatment of infectious diseases. The recommendation ought to be adopted with this modification that separate wards should be built at some distance from the main buildings of the Sir Jamsetji, Gokuldás Tejpál and European General Hospitals, instead of having a separate edifice. The Surgeon-General as well as the Senior Surgeon of the Jamsetji Jijibhoy Hospital are of opinion that relapsing fevers are infectious and patients suffering from them ought to be segregated. It is desirable that the scheme for the extension of Bombay should be worked out at an early date in order to remove the evil of a thick population which is one of the causes of relapsing fevers. As recommended by the Surgeon-General, no delay ought to be made in passing a law for the compulsory segregation of lepers, who should be provided with an asylum that should be maintained at the joint cost of Government and the municipal bodies.

Complaint against Captain Kennedy, Acting Third Assistant to the Political Agent, Káthiáwár.

32. The Rájyabhakt (126), in its issue of the 21st May, complains against Captain Kennedy, Acting Third Assistant to the Political Agent, Káthiáwár, in the matter of the appointment made by him in July last of a member of the family of Mr. Maganbhái Hathibhái of Ahmedabad, who was recommended by the Honourable Mr. Richey, as tutor to the Wadiya Prince on the large salary of Rs. 110 per mensem. The paper shows what a burden this large salary has been on the petty Wadiya táluka, first class States like Jámnagar and Dhrángadra paying Rs. 30 and Rs. 60 respectively to the tutors employed by them, and asks whether it is not tantamount to plundering the treasury of the táluka in question and whether the Captain could not have got a tutor in Káthiáwár itself for the prince studying Royal Reader No. 4. The paper then complains against Captain Kennedy having ordered the Nágar tutor to Prince Kálávála of the Luni táluka in Sorath, drawing Rs. 80 per mensem, to teach law to the prince while the tutor himself is ignorant of it instead of doing away with his services which were to be entertained for one year only, and observes that it has been recently arranged that the tutor in question should be taught the work of the administration of the táluka, that it would have been better if the Manager of the táluka had been entrusted with the work of teaching law and a saving effected thereby, asks whether Captain Kennedy has been appointed to Sorath for such management, and wants to know when Government wish to stop the arbitrary conduct of their European officers in Káthiáwár.

The proposals submitted to Government by the Judicial Commissioner in Sind, Mr. Macpherson, disapproved.

33. The Sind Sudhár (165), in its issue of the 18th May, writes:—We have heard that Mr. Macpherson, the present Judicial Commissioner in Sind, has submitted certain proposals to Government recommending the abolition of the appointment of the Subordinate Judge of Mirpur Batoro and the retention of his entire office establishment. He has proposed that the Subordinate Judge of Kotri should visit Mirpur Batoro once in the cold season and twice in the hot season and Sujáwal only once in the cold season, and that the establishment should receive petitions and applications for the Judge during his absence and forward them to him for disposal. Now if this proposal has really been submitted to Government, we beg to point out that it will inflict considerable hardship on the inhabitants of the Mirpur Batoro division, for the Subordinate Judge will hardly stay more than three months in the Batoro sub-division. In the year 1887 Mr. Candy, the then Judicial Commissioner in Sind, also proposed the reduction of one Subordinate Judge in the Karáchi District by attaching the táluka of Kotri to the jurisdiction of the Sehwan Subordinate Judge and by adding the tálukás of Mirpur Sakro, Ghorabari and Tatta, now subject to the jurisdiction of the Subordinate Judge of Kotri, to the Mirpur Batoro division and placing the whole under the control of only one Subordinate Judge instead of two, as at present, with head-quarters at Tatta. The inhabitants of the newly proposed division being dissatisfied with the intended changes applied to the Sind Sabha for assistance and represented their grievances to Government. The Government then referred the matter to Colonel Grant, an officer who has remained for a number of years in Sind, for favour of his opinion. This officer informed Government, in reply, that no good would result from the proposed change. It was thus that the idea of amalgamating the Mirpur Batoro with the Kotri division was given up. It is now upwards of two years that the matter has been again moved. In 1884, when Sir James Fergusson, the then Governor of Bombay, visited Sind, the Sind Sabha brought to His Excellency's notice that the number of Subordinate Judges in Sind was smaller than necessary and His Excellency in reply said that the number would never be reduced. It will thus appear that the proposal now submitted regarding the abolition of the appointment of the Subordinate Judge at Mirpur Batoro is quite at variance with the assurance given by Government in 1884, and we hope that Mr. Macpherson's proposals will not be accepted. Of all the divisions in the Karáchi District, Mirpur Batoro is the largest. It comprises four large tálukás, viz., (1) Mirpur Batoro, (2) Sujáwal, (3) Jati and (4) Sháhbandar. Its population is over two lákhs of souls. Its revenue amounts to nearly five lákhs of rupees. The whole of this division is on the river bank. For the last 22 years there has been a separate Subordinate Judge for the Mirpur Batoro division. People are now very sorry to see that proposals have been made to deprive them of the assistance of the Subordinate Judge. If Mr. Macpherson's recommendation is based on the ground that there is not enough work in the Mirpur Batoro Division to occupy the time of a separate Subordinate Judge, we beg to submit that the decrease in work (if any) is due to the fact that during the last few years no intelligent and experienced Judge has been appointed to the Mirpur division. During the current year, when Diwán Dhuramadás held charge of the Mirpur division for only 25 days, 525 suits were filed during that short period, and 100 more in March and April during his absence. From this it will be seen that if an intelligent and competent Subordinate Judge were placed in charge of the Mirpur Batoro division, there would be enough of work for him. Government should not dispose of this matter in hot haste, but should obtain the opinions of the leading citizens. Mr. Macpherson's recommendation, if sanctioned, will inflict considerable hardship on the people, who will begin to feel that they have been deprived of the right to obtain justice. We hope that the Sind Sabha, to which the people of Mirpur Batoro have written on the subject, will submit a memorial to Government in the matter.

The dilatoriness in the working of the Police Courts in Karáchi.

34. The Sind Times (5), in its issue of the 18th May, writes:—We have received a complaint about the present working of the Police Courts in Karáchi. We believe it must have been almost simultaneously with our contemporary's interview with the redress-seekers that the same complaint was brought to our notice also. We were startled on hearing what our applicant had to say. We then commenced a cross-examination of him, by which process we drew out of him a good deal which had best remain locked up in the innermost of our sanctum sanctorum. Suffice it to say that we eventually found that the great dilatoriness he so bitterly complained of was the necessary outcome of three things: (1) the various forms of procedure which a suitor in the Court has to go through; (2) the insufficiency of hands in the Police Court, i. e., the want of an assisting officer for less important cases; (3) the fact of the Court having passed successively through three officers within a brief space of time, with the inevitable result of arrears of work. To those who have had at one time or another to work in a Government department, this statement will not appear exaggerated. It is more the "pantomimic rapidity with which Government officials are being banged and whirled about" that accounts for the present state of work in the local Police Courts. We think we fairly succeeded in explaining to our referee, in his own fashion, to what his disappointment was due and sent him away a more contented and less dissatisfied man. After that we supplemented our deductions from the suitor's own statements by an enquiry, and the replies from more than one quarter indicate a consensus of opinion that the fault lay exactly where we thought it did. We strongly recommend the appointment of another Honorary Magistrate. But of this more hereafter.

The necessity for empannelling educated men to serve on juries.

35. The Káthiáwár Times (81), in its issue of the 22nd May, writes:—By empannelling incompetent men to serve on a jury there is a likelihood of justice being miscarried and unless Government wish to reduce trial by jury to trial by farce it is high time to make a thorough re-organization in this mode of judicial procedure. What we demand is that there should be on every jury men who could ascertain the facts on the evidence before them and come to a legitimate conclusion. Unless and until this is done and unless and until we have clever men to serve on a jury, not the least confidence can be placed in trial by jury.

A complaint against the commanding officer of some Native regiments in connection with the Pandit newspaper.

36. The Pandit (160), in its issue of the 24th May, says:—Some Native officers have complained to us that they have been compelled by their commanding officers to cease subscribing to the Pandit newspaper. This conduct of the commanding officers is evidently harmful to the interests of the Military Orphanage. It is to be hoped that His Excellency the Governor and His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught will make enquiries into this matter and call upon us to produce proofs in regard to the complaint. The managing committee have addressed letters to these commandants asking their reasons for adopting this despotic course, but we are sorry to say that with one exception we have not been favoured with a satisfactory reply. The Adjutant of the 9th Bombay N. I. has written to say that his commanding officer has issued an order directing to discontinue subscribing to the Pandit. No reason, however, is given for issuing this order. That no false impression may be produced about the policy of the Pandit a number of copies of the paper are sent free of any charge to all the military officers and some members of His Excellency the Governor's Council and every one of them can bear testimony to the fact of the policy of the Pandit being thoroughly loyal. The Pandit is most useful to the Native ranks and has been loyally serving the British Government for the last five years. The Benevolent Society has sufficient funds to support 35 orphans, but has no means of getting more children, and if Government be chary about rendering pecuniary help it ought to have no objection to getting a sufficient number of orphans sent to the Orphanage. There are thousands of military orphans who are uncared for, and it is the duty of our kind and gracious Government to provide us with means of getting these orphans through the commanding officers of their late fathers' regiments.

The recent fires at Surat and the city police.

37. The Gujaráti (77), in its issue of the 19th May, writes:—It is beyond doubt that but for the laudable exertions put forth by the people themselves to save themselves and their belongings during the recent fires at Surat the city would have suffered even more terribly. The city police has been found quite unequal to the task at a very critical time, and we hope Government will take effectual steps to allay the universal panic by re-organizing the whole force. The presence of a strong and well-disciplined force would have sustained the spirit of many a distressed soul and deterred the criminal classes in the city from committing the mischief they did and are still doing in some quarters.

Gambling in Rájkot and the inaction of the police.

38. The Káthiáwár Times (81), in its issue of the 22nd May, writes:—We understand that extensive gambling is going on in different localities in the Civil Station, Rájkot, for some time past. What have the police been doing? Police arrangements in the Civil Station require to be properly looked into.

Complaints against the Mahudha police.

39. The Svadesh Bandhu (136) of Mahudha, in its issue of the 22nd May, refers to a free fight between the Mevási Kolis numbering about 200 and armed with swords, bows and arrows, &c., and about 500 inhabitants of Mahudha at some distance from the Patel Tank on the midnight of the 16th instant caused by the Kolis throwing pieces of bricks, &c., at the town, and says that the assailants belong to the villages of Nadgaon and Undra near Mahudha. It complains of the Mahudha police having failed to duly protect the citizens, of the absence of the Chief Constable on the scene of occurrence and of his having released the next day a Dhárála boy named Dola Khuma and three others of the assailants arrested by the police at the time of the fight, calls the attention of Government to the matter and requests them to have the delinquents punished and to see that the affair is not repeated. The paper further observes that on the night of the 17th instant, from 300 to 500 Mahomedans of Mahudha were fishing in the Patel Tank and dirtied the water, that the Hindus were much pained thereby and that it is to be regretted that the police should not have stopped the Mahomedans from their work.

40. The Shri Shivdji (60), in its issue of the 17th May, says that considerable inconvenience is caused to the people by the rules of the post office savings banks being frequently revised and changed and by such changes and revisions not being communicated to the depositors. It complains that a great many depositors being women, they are put to a great deal of inconvenience. The paper suggests that all changes and revisions, as soon as they are made, should be translated into the different vernaculars and should be distributed among the constituents of the savings banks.

The necessity for communicating the changes in the rules of the post office savings banks to the depositors.

Part II.—Legislation.

41. In alluding to the memorandum on the amendments to the Factories Act proposed by the Government of India and agreed to by the Secretary of State, and to the recommendation made by Lord Cross to make it compulsory to close the factories on four days every month, the Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 22nd May, says:—The statement that the mill-hands absent themselves from work for about 65 days in a year proves that they are unable to engage in work continuously throughout the year. If the mill-labourers are allowed every Sunday as a holiday and a few important native holidays, fixing 60 as the total number of holidays in a year, the mill-hands will not, as they are stated to do now, absent themselves from their work at irregular intervals, and no loss will befal owners of mills by the proposed arrangement of the weekly holiday. [In writing on the same subject, the Akhbáre Sodágar (86), in its issue of the 21st May, says:—Lord Cross has very fortunately recommended that the mill-hands should have four days' holiday every month, and has not made the mistake of saying that they should be allowed a holiday on every Sunday. If he had made this mistake the mills would be closed for so many days in a year that the mill industry as well as the workmen would be at a disadvantage, since the mill-hands are averse to work on public holidays which are so numerous in India. The Government of India have proposed that a factory should include premises in which as many as twenty persons are employed. But several small indigenous industries employing twenty or a few more hands in each manufactory are being pursued in India and a few new industries have been started on a small scale, such as oil, paper, ink, soap, &c., after the order issued by the Government of India directing the consumption of indigenous products in preference to foreign goods in public offices, and the application of the Factory Act to these factories would be a certain death-blow to them. It is proposed that the District Magistrate should exercise supervision over factories in the districts as regards securing the proper sanitary condition and other vital matters, but there is likelihood of unnecessary and undesirable interference being made in the proper pursuit of industrial occupations from sheer ignorance, and it would be far better to entrust this work to inspectors who have experience of such matters. The Government of India have also proposed that no child under nine should be employed in any factory. At present a child of seven years or upwards may be employed and numerous children of mill-hands and other poor persons are usefully employed, affording good help to the earnings of their poor parents, instead of roaming about and proving a cause of anxiety to them while they are engaged in the factories or other places. The proposed raising of the age-limit would not therefore prove beneficial to the parents of these children as well as to mill-owners who now get child-labour so cheap.]

Amendments to the Factories Act proposed by the Government of India and agreed to by the Secretary of State for India.

42. With reference to the objection taken by European merchants in connection with the provision of the Merchandize Marks' Act requiring the stamping of lengths on cloths sold by length to the effect that such stamping would stain such cloths as prints, muslins, woollens and silks and to their request to be allowed to stick on such cloths paper labels showing their lengths, the Bombay Samáchár (91), in its issue of the 20th May, says:—The concession prayed for would miscarry the original object of the Merchandize

The Merchandize Marks' Act and the use of paper labels on certain kinds of cloth.

Marks' Act. However, since the objection is said to be backed up by the mercantile community of the three presidencies, it is to be hoped that some means will be devised to remove it without losing sight of the original object of the law. Certainly in these days of new inventions it will not be difficult to devise some sort of ink to stamp the cloths mentioned above without disfiguring them.

PART III.—Education.

Visit of Dr. Cooke, Acting Director of Public Instruction, Bombay, to Sind approved.

43. The Phœnix (3), in its issue of the 15th May, writes:—The visit of Dr. Cooke, Acting Director of Public Instruction, Bombay, to Sind is almost an event in the educational history of the province. Among the many ways in which this isolated province has been neglected by Bombay the educational neglect deserves prominent mention. Even local efforts have not been properly or generously supplemented by Government assistance, as is only too painfully evident in the case of the Sind Arts College. The appointment of a whole-time Educational Inspector and the selection of Mr. Jacob for the appointment are the only tardy recognition of the claims of the province. Mr. Chatfield, however, never thought the province worth a visit, and Dr. Cooke should be thanked for setting what, let us hope, will be a precedent. Mr. Jacob is full of enthusiasm for his work, and, although occasionally carried away by his enthusiasm, has already done more for the progress of education in Sind than had been accomplished in the last decade.

The Rájkumár College, Rájkot, and the action of Captain Kennedy, Acting Third Assistant to the Political Agent, Káthiáwár, in the matter of requiring certain tálukdárs in Káthiáwár to send their sons to it.

44. A correspondent writes to the Rájyabhakt (126) of the 21st May to say that Prince Ranig Khachar of Jasdan, who had been studying for the last three years in the Rájkumár College, Rájkot, left it at the end of April last, that he began reading Royal Reader No. 1 in the sixth class when he entered it and that he was reading the same book when he recently left it. When such is the state of progress in the College, why is, observes the correspondent, Captain Kennedy issuing stringent orders for sending the sons of the tálukdárs Godad Punja, Rukhad Gorkha, Nathu Chánparáj, Nágu Hamir, Desa Nima, and Rána Mámeya to it? The Captain has issued a similar order to Gidhad Sámat Khánji. Some of these tálukdárs are in debt, while some of them are very petty. Should those tálukdárs who cannot defray the heavy College expenditure be ordered to send their sons to it? Would it not be tyrannical on the part of Captain Kennedy if he were to persist in having his order carried out? What is the object then of having the Girásia School at Wadhwán? Great difficulty is experienced by Sorath not now having such a good Daftardár as Bábáji Rámchandar. The Government have issued a circular by which the Pránt officer is required to advise the parents of the princes who are of the proper age to join the College to send them to it, but it does not state that princes of tender age and the sons of those tálukdárs who are unable to meet the College expenditure should be sent to it. Does not the Captain know this?

Remarks in connection with the Cathedral High School Building, Bombay.

45. In expressing concurrence with the remarks made by the Director of Public Instruction, Bombay, in connection with the resolution of the authorities of the Cathedral High School to give up and sell the building in which the school has been hitherto held, finding another locality for erecting a new school-house, the Jáme Jamshed (108), in its issue of the 20th May, says that Government have sanctioned the proceedings of the school authorities, but in future should see that a plot of valuable ground or pecuniary help is not given to an educational institution unless it has been proved to the satisfaction of Government that the said institution is self-supporting and that there is no likelihood of the school building being used for any other than educational purposes.

PART IV.—Railways.

The necessity for Government to revise their railway policy.

46. The Gujarát Darpan (75), in its issue of the 23rd May, writes:—A short time back the Manchester Chamber of Commerce passed a resolution strongly advocating railway extension in this country. We do not take the responsibility of saying whether the resolution was an interested or a disinterested one. But this much is certain that the Secretary of State for India will have to devote his maturest thought to one aspect of the question before he gives his sanction to the construction of any fresh line. Long experience has shown us that the original concessions and guarantees given by the India Office to several railways and the drain on the exchequer consequent thereupon with equally compensating advantages have proved most prejudicial to the interests of the Indian taxpayer. These usually take the shape of an unqualified guarantee of a certain rate of interest (which is usually in excess of that at which the India Office can borrow) with a participation in the current profits. Thus an investor in railways in India has a greater return for his money with a Government guarantee than one who invests in Government stock. It was right on the part of Government as an inducement to English capitalists to give its guarantee in the beginning of railway enterprise in India. But now that they have found that they might make a worse use of their money than in developing the boundless resources of India where vast regions lie untapped for want of capital, it may not be necessary for the Government to extend its guarantee to all the future railways without discrimination and thus put a monetary obligation on the treasury. Guarantees and concessions become necessary where railway enterprise is a new one, and even though there are now in India only a little over 15,000 miles of railway, which is not at all up to the requirements of the vastness of the country, we consider that that initiatory stage has been passed and English investors would take kindly to railways without any guarantee, if only really productive commercial lines were taken in hand. The Indian Government and the Indian taxpayer would thus eventually be great gainers. Whatever may have been the advantages derived by the country at large from railways, they have most heavily told on the Government revenue. We find that there has been an increasing deficit in the railway accounts. This of course includes the loss incurred on State railways, both commercial and strategic which are on the North-West Frontier. This clearly shows that the railway policy of the India Office is highly questionable and its business capacities may well be called in doubt. In India we are well cognisant of the fact that we are lacking in capital though we have enough of cheap labour, but this does not preclude us from saying that that capital could be more advantageously got in England where the people would like to invest in a dependency of Britain rather than go to France, Germany and Russia to dispose of their money. At the present time several railway schemes are lying before the Government of India one of which is from Wadhwán through Kutch to Hyderabad in Sind. Another is the Chittagong-Assam line and various others besides these. The Godhra-Dohad line has been repeatedly urged upon the attention of the Government by the Bombay Chamber of Commerce and other public bodies. These may have their advantages. But the Government cutting its coat according to its cloth should not give its unqualified guarantee to each and all without ascertaining that they would pay. If its moral support only is wanted, it may extend it so that it be not perplexed financially. From the above it should not be understood that we are out and out against the extension of railways, but where the objects of the projectors are served and only one side of the question is looked to, one is not wrong if he question the utility of Government guarantee.

Injustice done to a railway employé by his employers, the G. I. P. Railway Company.

47. The Jagadádarsh (34), in its issue of the 19th May, brings to light a case of injustice alleged to have been done to a railway employé by his employers, the G. I. P. Railway Company, which is as follows:—A European officer was travelling with considerable luggage by railway from the Yeola station. The station-master objected to so much luggage being carried without payment. He therefore asked the gentleman to have the luggage weighed and to pay for its carriage. The gentleman demurred to this. Thereupon the station-master told the porters to take the luggage to the weighing machine, got it weighed and asked for the payment. The European gave the money, but with a threat that the station-master would have to repent for his foolhardiness, and that he would take the case to Mr. Henry Conder and have the Bráhmans punished. True to his word, the gentleman did tell this tale to Mr. Henry Conder, and Mr. Conder, with that fine sense of justice for which he is famous, rewarded the station-master by transferring him to the most unhealthy station on the line. Is this a reward to the station-master for his faithful service to the G. I. P. Railway Company?

Complaint against the Rajputána-Málwa Railway.

48. The Ahmedabad Times (85), in its issue of the 21st May, complains of the passengers being sometimes unable to secure tickets in time at the Ahmedabad, Kalol, Mehsána and Siddhpur stations on the Rajputána-Málwa Railway and of the passengers having sometimes to wait for a day or two at these stations owing to want of accommodation in the railway carriages, and observes that travellers have to suffer great inconvenience and trouble on occasions of fairs owing to their being left behind at stations and over-crowding in carriages, that it is to be regretted that the railway authorities should not have yet adopted remedial measures, and that the Traffic Manager of the Rajputána-Málwa Railway should speedily attend to the matter.

PART V.—Municipalities.

Major Selby's appointment on the Standing Committee of the Municipal Corporation, Bombay, approved.

49. The Rást Goftár (82), in its issue of the 19th May, writes:—We cannot but express our great satisfaction at the successful return of Major Selby to the Standing Committee of the Bombay Municipal Corporation in place Sir Henry Morland. Public disappointment was expressed when Major Selby's claims to a seat on the Standing Committee were passed over by Councillors during the last general election, but that disappointment has been short-lived, and hardly two months have passed away when they have rectified their mistake by giving him once more a seat among their chosen representatives who form their executive body and thereby testified to the sterling worth and qualifications of the gallant member, and to the important and self-sacrificing services he has rendered to the city. Major Selby's appointment comes in good time, for the vexed question of our leaking reservoirs is soon coming on in the Standing Committee for settlement, and no member has more qualified himself by a study of the whole question than Major Selby to deal with it ably, independently, and in a fair and liberal spirit.

The grant of Rs. 1,000 made by the Poona Municipality to the local Gáyan Samáj and disapproval of the action of the Commissioner, C. D., in the matter.

50. The Dnyán Prakásh (11), in its issue of the 20th May, writes:—Towards the end of last year the Poona Municipality sanctioned a grant of Rs. 1,000 to the local Gáyan Samáj to enable it to purchase a piece of ground then available for erecting a suitable building thereon for housing the Samáj and its thriving school. Some person thereupon complained to Mr. Vidal, the then Collector of Poona, against the municipality on this very subject, and requested his interference for preventing what he considered to be an abuse of powers. Mr. Vidal, however, declined to interfere on the ground that although opinions might differ as to the expediency of the grant under notice, it was a matter entirely within the discretion of the municipality, and that as that body had exercised its discretion he did not see his way to interfere. This reply from Mr. Vidal did not satisfy the complainant, for he appears to have gone with his complaint to Mr. Moore, Commissioner, Central Division. This officer, without in the first instance calling for an explanation from the municipality, has summarily intimated to that body through the Collector of the district that it should withdraw the grant, and that if it was not withdrawn the matter would be reported to Government. Now we should like to know under what section of the District Municipal Act the Commissioner of the Division is prepared to justify his interference. We should also like to know what power, if any, the municipality possesses to compel the Gáyan Samáj to refund the amount in the event of the latter refusing to do so. And finally we should like to know what is the use of the Legislature having conferred large discretionary powers of expenditure on municipal boards under Section 24 (amended), clauses 16 to 21, if there is to be a wanton interference with the powers of municipalities on every occasion that their action does not meet with the approval of the intermediate controlling authorities? But it is not on merely technical grounds like those indicated above that we take exception to the action of the Divisional Commissioner on the present occasion. Our objection is based on other practical grounds also. It is to a deserving institution that the Poona Municipality sanctioned the grant of Rs. 1,000 under Section 24, clauses 16 and 21, and the Divisional Commissioner, perhaps in ignorance of the usefulness of the institution and of its claim for a reasonable support, has now required the municipality to withdraw the said grant of Rs. 1,000. Since 1882 the Gáyan Samáj has been doing its best to increase its usefulness, and is it really too much for the local municipality to have marked its appreciation of the useful work done by the Samáj from 1879 downwards by complying with the application of that body for some adequate help? The municipality has been for years past assisting with pecuniary grants such useful institutions as the local educational institutions, departmental and private, the library, the museum, cattle and poultry shows, &c., and can it reasonably be said that the grant of Rs. 1,000 to the Gáyan Samáj is such an extravagant misuse of its discretionary powers that the Divisional Commissioner must needs call upon the municipality to withdraw it under pain of being reported unfavourably to Government in the event of its failure to do so? We cannot agree with the Divisional Commissioner, and have every confidence that the Government even will refuse to support him in his unjustifiable interference on the present occasion.

Cholera in Surat and the negligence of the local municipality in the matter.

51. The Gujaráti (77), in its issue of the 19th May, writes:—Cholera is now raging with all its dreadful fury in Surat and the public is anxious to know the measures the municipality has taken for coping with its ravages. The present unhappy condition of Surat, for which its municipality is largely responsible, ought to be a warning to all other cities in India, and we hope every municipality in the country will try its best to meet the two most pressing demands of modern life, viz., improved water-supply and sanitation. [The Gujarát Darpan (75), in its issue of the 19th May, says that 550 deaths have occurred from cholera in Surat during the last four months, that from 8 to 10 persons succumb to it daily, that it is raging in the quarter known as Bhágátaláv, that stringent remedial measures do not still appear to have been taken by the municipal and Government authorities and that this state of things is to be deeply regretted.]

Cholera in Surat and the resolution of the local sanitary committee as regards public dinners and feasts commended.

52. The Suryă Prakásh (84), in its issue of the 18th May, writes:—The energetic chairman of the sanitary committee, Surgeon Kaikhasru Sorábji Narimán, deserves the best thanks of the educated public for the resolution that has been passed at the last meeting of the committee to the effect that the District Magistrate be requested to issue a notice, as early as possible, under the power vested in him by the Act, prohibiting all sorts of public dinners and feasts for a period of two months in and around five miles of Surat. We hope that the resolution will receive the early attention of our worthy District Magistrate, for cholera has of late been raging very furiously in the city. The municipal authorities are discouraging public feasts and dinners so far as the Municipal Act permits, i. e., permission is not granted to occupy public roads for the purpose. But there being no provision in the same Act prohibiting public feasts and dinners on by-roads and in lanes, the people have been making free use of them without the permission of the municipal authorities. The latter are quite helpless in prosecuting and getting the parties concerned punished in the absence of a notice being issued by the District Magistrate under the Indian Penal Code.

The Rájkot Municipality and its constitution.

53. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 19th May, writes:—Rájkot is to have a municipality. The members are not elected, but nominated. We are sorry to see that the choice is not happy. The authorities wished to form something like a representative body, consisting of members selected from each of the different sections of society to represent that section. We do not know whether such a representative body is, under all circumstances, the best adopted to carry out the purposes for which a municipality exists. In the beginning it is more desirable to have members able and willing to discharge the responsibility that rests on their shoulders. In a place like Rájkot, where independence of views is naturally very rare, more than ordinary care is needed in nominating members, lest everything be looked at from the official point of view exclusively. Looking at the list of members, we find over and besides the four or five ex-officio members, one Pársi, one Christian, one Mahomedan, and two Hindus. Hardly two of these non-official members can be said to have any knowledge of or capacity for business. Water is a crying need at Rájkot. We are eager to know what the new municipality does to supply this much-felt want. In this respect at least it ought to begin well.

PART VI.—Native States.

The appointment of a Mahomedan gentleman to the Council of Regency, Kashmir, approved.

54. The Indian Spectator (1), in its issue of the 19th May, writes:—The appointment of a Mahomedan gentleman to the Regency Council at Kashmir is one of those wise acts which inspire all classes of Her Majesty the Queen's subjects with confidence in the intentions of her Government. In India we are glad to see some of our Hindu contemporaries amongst the first to welcome this appointment.

The system of appointing managers of Native States in Káthiáwár condemned.

55. The Rájyabhakt (126), in its issue of the 21st May, writes:—The peculiar system of management of States of minor Chiefs in Káthiáwár leaves their Ráj families (from whom the States are for the time alienated by allotment of meagre monthly allowances) entirely at the mercy of their managers. The appointments of managers are made merely to take prudent care of the girás estates. But the ambitious managers, with the firm support of European officers, assume full powers and pass orders on matters affecting these Ráj families, to which implicit obedience is the only alternative. Even if they are dissatisfied with the orders, they are so ill-circumstanced that they cannot speak against them. They have to submit quietly because they fear the wrath of the authorities whom even a just but feeble protest throws at once into a rage. Slight rupture with a manager or a European officer in Káthiáwár entails untold harm on the helpless Ráj family. If in a rare instance redress against such arbitrary orders is sought by an application or appeal, the authorities who passed the orders sit in judgment on them. If they ever think of going to the higher authorities for redress, a policy of non-interference is eagerly awaiting to do them the desired service. So that the grievances of Ráj families which left them on a visit for redress return big, the original amount intact plus something else in the shape of aggravation, under the apparently fair name of future good of the táluka. What wonder if such a system becomes in a large measure harassing to the families of deceased tálukdárs? Is not this system opposed to all principles of justice and equity, and is not this treatment of Ráj families anything but human? And yet it is one of the recognized modes of dealing out justice in force in the province of Káthiáwár in the present age of reform, peace and progress. It does not seem to be the look-out of the higher officials to bear in mind the dangers of a one-man rule in the States of minor Chiefs. The Ráj families, which are naturally interested in the welfare of the States, are given no voice either in the appointment of State servants or in State affairs. On the contrary, they are neglected to an alarming extent and even their wants and grievances long remain uncared for, whereas the nominee of the Agency is entrusted with responsible and unlimited powers. On him ostensibly rests the sole so-called responsibility, while he in fact virtually enjoys every sort of immunity. He is a standard authority on every State question, however imperfect or temporary his knowledge of the State may be. It is only on his words and reports that higher tribunals in charge of supervision as a rule feel bound to act. These latter hardly blink the simple fact that the manager cannot be on good terms with every one in the State or that at times he has a body to be kicked and a soul to condemn. On the contrary, they consider themselves justified in viewing every act of the manager as being entirely free from mean diplomacy, hatred or malice. To be brief, he may not altogether be an objectionable person, but doubtless to some extent he is an inferior governing agency. The sad end of certain unfortunate managers emphatically points to a long-felt necessity for reform in this peculiar system of Native administration which has hitherto worked more harm than good and which has practically enslaved entire States.

The Kárbháris of the Native States of Káthiáwár.

56. The Sauráshtră Darpan (131), in its issue of the current month, says:—The Native Chiefs of Káthiáwár are almost all well educated at the Rájkumár College and the sound education they have received has befitted them to rule intelligently and wisely their respective patrimonies. However, these States are mismanaged by the Kárbháris or Diwáns, who have had no education worth mentioning and who happen to rise to the exalted and responsible position of an administrator of a State, simply because they are employed in the office of the Political Agent of the province. Properly speaking, those who had in their power to select Kárbháris for these States are responsible for the mismanagement therein. This state of things ought not to be allowed to continue any longer, and well-educated and experienced persons ought to be appointed Kárbháris of Native States.

57. The Rájyabhakt (126), in its issue of the 21st May, writes:—The Pálitána State was during the time of its late ruler Sursingji considered one of the best governed Native States in Káthiáwár in giving due protection to its subjects, proper management of affairs and its pecuniary condition, social position and respectability amongst the Native States. First-class States even envied its constitution. This good name has been totally lost by its present Chief, Mánsinghji. The State has incurred so much debt that its employés cannot get their pay in full. It is rumoured that on account of large arrears of pay due to the employés and of the frequent demands of merchants for payment of miscellaneous debts incurred by the State, the Chief is trying to borrow five lákhs of rupees of a merchant and to assign to the creditor the revenue of some villages for the interest of the amount thus borrowed. This is much to be deplored. The British Government should see its way to taking up the management of the State in its own hands from such an incompetent Chief in the interests of the Chief himself as well as his subjects. The cause of all this debt is said to be attributable to the irregular conduct of the ruler, who has become altogether indifferent to the satisfactory discharge of his duties, always indulging himself in drinking, low company and singing parties of dancing girls. It cannot be understood why the British Government should not pay due attention to the improvement of this rotten State.
